The author's representation of the phantasmagoric state, with its non-linear patterns and abrupt changes of rhythm, becomes a perfect medium for puppets whose very presence evokes a magical and insubstantial atmosphere difficult to achieve with human forms. Strindberg's characters defy realistic definition (most of them are unnamed, classified only as the "Poet", the "Lawyer", the "Blind Man"), deriving their dramatic impulse from qualities they embody or images they evoke and remain static, specific types throughout the play.

While human actors' portrayals of these characters could easily degenerate into caricatures of the worst kind, especially since many of the lines border on mawkish sentiment, the puppets, each with a single emotion captured in the mask-like faces, become eloquent yet economic illustrations of the essential qualities intended. Thus the wiping away of an imaginary tear is a profound image encompassing all the subtleties of sorrow and grief. The concentration of an entire emotion or characteristic into one gesture or symbol also becomes, in the hands of Felix Mirbt the puppet master (who, along with Jean Herbiet, directed the play), the occasion of wit and gentle self-parody as when the mother, a pair of pop-bottle lenses astride her nose, makes the obvious comment about her failing eyesight.

Bill Glasco, director of the four actors (Clare Coulter, Richard Greenblatt, David Hembel, Patricia Ludwick) who provided the voices for their silent partners, is presumably responsible for unifying the vocal and physical interpretations of the production. Brilliantly costumed as Indian gods and goddesses, the narrators speak the thoughts of the puppets (and hence are subordinate to them) and yet, by virtue of their divine garb and elevated position of the stage, become overseers of the action — the ultimate manipulators.

While the concept of the narrators as both mannikins and manipulators is somewhat contradictory, Strindberg himself justifies this interpretation by seeing The Dream Play as a representation of the Eastern concept of life as a dream, created and witnessed by the divinities. Whether or not this idea is fully substantiated within either the play or the Tarragon Production, it is intriguing nonetheless.

The stylized presentation created by the use of the puppets is reinforced by the unrealistic verbalizing of the narrative. Alternating chapters, each actor performs all of the roles both male and female, providing an interesting convention, an assortment of interpretations, and an appropriate link with the incredibility of the dream consciousness.

The insurmountable problems of evoking a dream-like setting which must at the same time provide a background for a dozen locales and also complement the overall style of the production would become, at the hands of a person less creative than Michael Egan, a designer's nightmare. Egan manages however, to emerge with flying colours. Pure, unadulterated rainbow hues please the eyes, but ultimately enable the imagination to please itself.

Escape & death in America Goodbar: sex & violence

Whenever some writer or director takes a slice of American life, what is usually found is blood and raw meat going putrid. Not since Kluge has any vaguely honest film given even faint hope for a way of life which seems to satisfy so little yet which is clung to so desperately. If you don't know already, Looking For Mr. Goodbar is not a pleasant film in the same lump, liberal tradition, of, say, One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest or Julia. It is a film deep in sickness and stomach-wrenching (sic) violence. Vague expectations of disco being transformed into a consciousness-raising experience are destroyed with a thoroughness reminiscent of Taxi Driver.

Mr. Goodbar stars Diane Keaton as Theresa (Terry, by night) an ex-Catholic throwing herself into a life of freedom, self-identity and sex. Despite the apparent swell of self-proclamation, this life takes shape as an escape, a defense and a reaction, as spontaneous and creative as gravity. Her flight from a family (and its expectations) sick with sentimentality, leads, with an inevitability obvious to an audience making the same escape, to a room of her own and sex, lots of sex. If the script has any respectability it is due to the ring of truth which old "original sin" still seems to have. The Catholic piety made maudlin in its escape from a world sick with the Enlightenment remembered and named for us by the recurring violence which the modern world produces and records and produces again.

Keaton is very good as the girl the audience sympathizes with (even while made embarrassed watching her nipples erect, something Woody Allen never let us see, or gave us to suspect.) She is innocent, and desperate to be in control, moment by moment becoming harder and harsher, human only because she was born that way. Freedom, independence and "being her own woman" are the compulsive parameters of her life, a life which exists equally in her imagination and in 'the world.' The film is consistent in relating the separation between the two, though we cannot enjoy the confusion the way Theresa does. Her desire for freedom cuts her off from her family (the arch-foe) in every way except the important one, her nature, her congenital doom.

While painting a bleak and unsympathetic picture of everything that is an obstacle to Theresa's will, the film does not pretend that Theresa actually achieves anything except orgasm. The one virtue she seems to have, a genuine commitment to working with the deaf, impresses only those who dramatize such skills as if they were not as beyond control or decision or merit as being tall or blue-eyed. The film does not let us make her a heroine because she does a job most of us consider generous. There is also no consolation in the fact that everyone else in the film, save one poor black dude, is at least as sick as Theresa, though they lack the script and acting to make them look interesting.

The film systematically rips apart all alternate ways of life, defining every human relationship from old-fashioned marriage to friendship to group sex in terms of psychopathology. Having dismissed all possible escapes except a fortress life with occasional raids for the sake of pleasure, in this case the use of a man's genitals, the film finishes with even that possibility containing its own seed of destruction. No Gnostic or Calvinist could have painted a more complete picture of human sickness, or insisted with such emotion that we watch it at work.

There is a definite feeling in the audiences I've seen of having been taken for a ride, that the violence is unnecessary, or at least more than anyone bargained for. Perhaps if the film offered some alternative people would accept the last twenty minutes as the price they have to pay for wisdom. Fanatically, the film transforms the audience into participants rather than mere spectators, since for both the audience and Theresa, gruesome violence arrives when only pleasure was invited.

Our attachment to pleasure and the violence which takes place against our will parallels Theresa's. She is wound around her sexuality tightly and completely, experiencing her most important (her only?) pleasures physically. Everything important in the film for the audience takes place visually, all dialogue (some of which is trite and pretentious) serving only to say what we already know. The film would have lost nothing but its commercial success if it had been shot as a silent. The final violence is lit by a strobe, slicing life into black and white frames. This last primitive sequence seems not to be a film, since it is not the camera but our own eye and the strobe which breaks up each scene. It ends with the lights going off, just as when each of us calls the day quits.

Looking for Mr. Goodbar is an incredible film of large intention, hardly perfect and not quite deserving the rave reviews it has been getting. It relies on the stereotypes common to morality plays, offering one large insight at the expense of the small ones which give depth and credibility. Not even the most fanatic of moviegoers will see it more than once, but everyone will remember it.

Michel Barnes

Compassion, love in Wisconsin

Stroszek is Werner Herzog's next to latest film, now finishing its second week at the Fine Arts Cinema on Yonge St. It is a bleak film dealing with our alienation from each other and our society. The subject, however, is treated warmly and humanistically by Herzog, specifically by his use of Bruno S. in the starring role. Bruno is a street musician in Berlin, an orphan, who had been in and out of orphanages, reform schools and other related institutions for most of his life. From this life Herzog draws his film.

The first image of the film is Stroszek, behind bars, surrounded on all sides by hallways. He is given back his accordion and train horn by prison officials, lectured by the warden on the evils of alcohol and set 'free'. The film then cuts to Stroszek's view of the outside world through a fishbowl by his barred windows. We see familiar shapes of people and cars going by but entirely distorted and unreal.

Stroszek leaves the prison and goes directly to his local bar where he sees his friend Eva whose pimps are arguing her price with someone. Eva is a person alienated from her humanity and sexuality. She is adopted by Stroszek after one of the pimps strikes her. Stroszek returns to his old life, to the streets and courtyards as a musician and renews his acquaintance with his old neighbour, Scheiz. By this time we have realized that Stroszek is not a normal person: he is afflicted with extreme sensitivity, compassion and gentleness towards his music, his friends and the rest of the world. But more strongly, I think, Stroszek (and Bruno S.) radiate a human nobility which withstands adversity and repression, institutionalized and otherwise.

Stroszek and Eva decide to emigrate with Scheiz to the United States, the land of displaced persons. They will live with Scheiz' nephew in Wisconsin and help out with his garage. They arrive in New York, buy a car and drive to Wisconsin. They are accompanied, on the soundtrack by a beautiful Chet Atkins song, 'Are you going my way?' which gives the scene its sense of beauty and sadness.

Railroad Flats, Wisconsin is their destination and, perhaps, the bleakest place imaginable. All three quickly fit in to American society. Eva gets a job in a truckstop as a waitress, Stroszek helps out in the garage and Scheiz begins conducting experiments on animal magnetism or the life force. They buy an immense mobile home — decorated in sublime American suburban fashion — and a colour TV on credit. On Sundays they go hunting with a metal detector for the missing tractor of a supposedly murdered farmer.

Soon their world begins to crack up. The bank hounds them for payments. Stroszek and Eva start to drift apart. Stroszek feels very hurt by the spiritual punishment being inflicted upon him by America. Then everything collapses: Eva leaves for Vancouver with two C.B. talking truckers and the mobile home and TV are repossessed and auctioned by the bank.

Scheiz is convinced that a conspiracy is bringing them all this unhappiness. Outraged, he and Stroszek set off to rob a bank, which is closed, so they settle for $25 from the till of a barbershop next door. Scheiz is caught as they are shopping in a grocery store across the street. Stroszek escapes with a turkey and a shotgun and drives down foggy, bleak roads to an unbelievably crass Indian tourist town. Native people in this town serve as police which demonstrates their intrinsic corruption.

Stroszek goes to an amusement arcade where chickens, ducks and rabbits perform dances and so on when one deposits a quarter. These are pathetic, funny and horrifying symbols for human life in this society and an explanation of Stroszek's feelings as he gets on an empty ski-lite and shoots himself.

This may sound bleak. It is depressing to confront the absence of meaning in life and the institutions which split and destroy our feelings and relationships with each other and the world around us. But Herzog's treatment of the subject gives the film humanity and humour and makes it a meaningful experience and Bruno S. deserves an Academy Award.

Loot lotsa laughs lifts low lobes

The New Vic Theatre Company's first production of the season was Loot, a play written by Joe Orton and performed from October 20-22 at Victoria College's N.A.B. auditorium.

The production of Loot was masterminded by Blake Heathcote, who, overseeing everything from design and costume to directing and producing, seemed to have done all but perform the play for the actors. In fact, I'm sure he did that too during the rehearsals.

In any case, Heathcote's amazing theatrical competence was very much in evidence Saturday evening. Unfortunately, either U of T students are a bunch of apathetic louts when it comes to spending a cultural evening, or the play was very poorly publicized. There were less than forty spectators present, but since there were only six characters in the performance, that really wasn't a bad turn out for relatives and friends of the family, who had perhaps been there on Thursday and Friday night too.

Despite the almost one-dimensional punniness of the stage and the barn-like proportions of the auditorium, Loot proved to be absorbing and highly amusing to all concerned. An important factor to the production's success was the actual choice of the play. After all, how could a script which involves madness, robbery, murder, political and social commentary and gruesomely funny lines not be appealing to a general audience? For example, a typical Ortonian line runs as follows: "With madness, as with vomit, it's the passer-by who receives the inconvenience".

After twenty minutes of cogitation, the plot can be summarized: the play opens as McLeavy mourns over his wife's coffin. Unbeknown to him, his son Hal and his undertaker friend Dennis have removed the corpse and substituted the money from a bank job they have just pulled. Complications arise as Truscott, a police inspector disguised as a water board official, enters the scene.

METRO POLICE EMERGENCY TASK FORCE

"They don't believe we're from the Water Board. I'm hurt. Bitches."

The amateur cast included Neil Michael Davidson as the victimized McLeavy, Miriam Jones as the lethal nurse Fay, Eric Wellington as the son Hal, Alex Fallis as the undertaker

Dennis, Bryan Collieran as the Columbo-like Truscott and Julia Bennett as the odious policewoman Meadows. Equally adept in their roles, no one actor stole the show although Wellington as the wimpy Hal flourished admirably in his role while Collieran as Truscott made the most of a difficult one. As for "nifty" Neil Michael Davidson, he played the part of the pink-bloodied and wonderfully vacant, elderly McLeavy so convincingly that I'm almost sure he's a remarkably well-preserved senior citizen.

Altogether, it was a good production of a great play. For all those who regrettably missed out on Loot, keep an eye out for Blake Heathcote's next gala production, the stage musical Cabaret, coming soon to your local Innis College pub.

Kick out the perogies

Admission to the concert of contemporary and traditional Ukrainian music at the Parkdale Library last Tuesday evening happened to be free, but a lot of people came anyway. The program was started off with a scholarly lecture on the history of Ukrainian musical composition given by Mr. Zenobiy Lawryshyn, former conductor of London's Drury Lane Theatre Orchestra. Next came two pre-university students who happened to be brother and sister. The brother, Vasyly Sydorenko played one of his own compositions on the piano, Ukrainian Rhapsody No. 1, which sounded like background music for a silent movie. His younger sister Halyna played the sopilka, a traditional Ukrainian instrument, resembling a flute. Both of them were so tight you couldn't have pulled pins out of their assholes with a pair of pliers. After this came intermission, which gave everyone a chance to look at exhibits and drink free coffee.

Highlights of the evening were piano whiz-kid Marta Vynysky and singer Victoria Masnyk, ably accompanied by Cynthia Clark (the token Wasp) on piano. Marta played a contemporary work, one of those things that sound like chaos to the untrained ear and will give you a hernia if you try to hum it. Masnyk has a truly lovely voice, but each time she took a breath, her face contorted with the intensity of battling Bedouin and her eyes popped out as if she were being strangled. Opera-singing might take as much effort as weightlifting, but it's not supposed to look that way.

The real star of the show, however, was an old man with a flash camera who did his best to continually disrupt the proceedings.

Bowie's hero Eno

Aside from bearing a hermaphroditically beautiful countenance and an enticingly lithe frame, David Bowie also has an appealing and versatile voice. It is therefore unfortunate that although the cover portrait on Bowie's new release Heroes is a photographic and visual masterpiece, the contents of the album contain less than sixty per cent of David's potentially vibrant vocals.

Side Two, for instance, is almost wholly instrumental. It begins with "V-2 Schneider", reminiscent of Kraftwerk's negligible, teutonic talents. "Sense of Doubt" follows, which runs like a soundtrack from a third-rate Dracula movie. The rest of the side likewise displays Bowie's questionable taste for the macabre and the futuristic in music. Of course, the blame cannot entirely be laid to rest upon David's frail shoulders. He has more than a little help and influence from his friends, particularly Brian Eno on synthesizers, keyboards and guitar treatments, and Robert Fripp on lead guitar.

Despite how sparsely he employs it, Bowie's voice on Side One is in top form, never more so than on the title track "Heroes". Romantic fans and sentimental fools until Pithy lyrics presented in David's best pseudo-Charles Boyer tones combine with surprisingly effective and emotive background arrangements by Eno to create a song of which dreams or perhaps even soap opera themes are made. But seriously now, this tune is definitely worth the price I paid for the entire album.

For old fans like myself who still mourn for the Bowie-come-Ziggy of yesteryear, there is also "Sons of the Silent Age"; certainly not another "Life on Mars?" but a big step back in the right direction. Bowie's lovable "I'm just from South London therefore I guess I should sound like a cute Cockney" accent resurges to new heights while the accompaniment in the song is refreshingly unenforced.

Since the chameleon-like Bowie is both a faultless mimic and a confessed thief of other performers' musical ideas, one is hard put to ascertain a distinctive trademark in his music. Nevertheless, in his new album Heroes, the essence of the bygone Bowie is back, although regrettably diluted by Eno's concoctions.

Let us Bowie fans thus hope and pray that before his next musical venture, David will recall a line from the tune "Heroes", turn resolutely to his pal Eno, and remark: "nothing . . . nothing will keep us together".

Olivor twists disc

Listening to Jane Olivor's second album, Chasing Rainbows, is much like watching a naturally beautiful girl put on too much makeup. You can't help hoping that she'll realize she should be complementing her gifts rather than masking them. Jane Olivor possesses an extraordinary voice, with tremendous power and punity. Yet she insists on recording ridiculously pedestrian music.

This is the main flaw on her first album, First Night. She has changed producers with Chasing Rainbows, but the problem remains. The beautiful force of her voice should be reinforcing the emotional statements of the songs she sings, rather than covering up their obvious flaws. When she gets hold of a song that stands up on its own, her voice, combined with the strong lyrics and musical intensity, provide an overwhelming effect.

Unfortunately, when the song is along the lines of "The Big Parade" by Neil Sedaka, the production must resort to tricks (in this case, SWAT-theme musical effects), and Olivor's singing just builds and builds for no apparent reason. Even worse, what few 'quiet' songs there are on the album get lost in the shuffle because they don't sound as intense, and hence, important, as the competition.

It's a tribute to Jane Olivor's voice, that despite the defects in song selection, Chasing Rainbows still impresses. It's just a pity that her voice couldn't be lent to equally impressive material.

Charlie Keil

Fab fiddler

It's becoming increasingly difficult to categorize artists such as Jean-Luc Ponty as either rock or jazz musicians. The conventional categorizations have been so muddled by the dabbblings of people like Frank Zappa and the pretensions of people like Jan Hammer that artists of Ponty's cast, who rightfully belong in the jazz field, are becoming rock heroes.

Well, despite the babblings of the stray Rick Wakeman fan, who think that any piece of music with a solo by any instrument besides a guitar in it is progressive rock, Ponty's new album, Enigmatic Ocean firmly roots him as a jazz artist. He has taken the structured, electronic jazz that Weather Report has been so instrumental in shaping, and gone one better by leaving lots of room for individual improvisations. The result is a rich, textured music which, although it can and does stand by itself, can serve as a vehicle for solo work. The artists on this album are all extremely adept. Ralphie Armstrong, the bassist, in particular stands out. His one solo on side two is as interesting as anything the guitarists on the album do. Ponty himself alternates nicely between slow, mood-evoking work and a crazed synthesizer sound. One wishes, however, that he would drop the progressive frenzy for just a moment to give us a lyrical, Stephane Grappelli vein.

The album as a whole stands up very well as an accessible piece of the new jazz that is being shaped by young, rock-oriented artists. Although the concept behind the piece (something about an ocean and turtles) is vague and superfluous, making the "Overture" and most of the song titles rather silly, the album holds together nicely as one of the best things Ponty has done.

Paul Budra

Asphyxiated rats

No More Heroes is the second offering from the Stranglers, England's premier sophisto-punk rockers. Their first album IV Rattus Norvegicus featured a morbid preoccupation with rats and burst on the English charts, keeping company with such contemporary touchstones as Max Bygraves' Greatest Hits Volume 12. The first album also produced a hit single "Peaches," noted for its reference to an amazingly intimate part of the female body. The Stranglers are four healthy necrophiles who have been disgustingly successful as musicians.

The Stranglers' closest American counterparts are Tom Verlaine's Television. Perhaps avant-garde is a better description than punk, for both these groups have a certain amount of talent and innovativeness.

The band is a four-piece outfit comprising bass, drums, guitar and synthesizer. Each song revolves around a strong rhythm section while guitar and synthesizer go off on bizarre tangents. Hugh Cornwell and Jean Jacques Burnel snarl rather than sing and their vocals are embellished by echo, phase shifter and other nifty electronic devices. The music is cute in an obscene sort of way, drawing heavily on such groups as the Doors and Roxy Music.

No More Heroes is essentially an odd and outlandish album. Lyrically the tone is bitter as almost every institution from religion to womanhood is attacked. The title track recalls such late greats as Leon Trotsky (well loved on our campus), Sancho Panza, (also well loved on our campus) and Stalin (very well loved on our campus). It ends in true Sex Pistol fashion as the band chants "No more heroes any more" (grammar is not one of the boy's highpoints). However, it is the album's finale, "School Mam", which is the numero uno composition: a Marat-

Sade attack on the futility of going to school. At the end Hugh and the boys are left screaming Multiplications tables into the mikes.

The album is musically well constructed and the production is faultless. It is a bitter childish work that sounds like a collaboration between the Velvet Underground and Son of Sam. As a taste of English avant-garde rock, it's worth buying for your middle-aged father as a birthday present. If you're into Foghat, forget it.

Neil Michael Davidson

New Steely damp

Odd, but people really do wait for albums. Friends of mine have been waiting for a new album by Steely Dan for months. There have been rumours too, of a tour, a break-up, of an album on which no member of the band plays . . .

And now there's Aja complete with inscrutable cover and pompous-as-hell liner notes. Some of the rumours are true. Of the original members of the band only Walter Becker and Donald Fagan remain. Becker has forsaken his bass on some tracks and plays guitar on others. Fagan still sings but his piano has been ceded to others and he confines his playing to synthesizer work which ranges from transparent to inaudible. The remainder of the musicians are the studio regulars (Larry Carlton, Tom Scott . . .) who've made every album that's come out of L.A. in the last three years. Show the credit list to a fan and he'll make like you poured Javex in his face.

After a first listening the worries persist. You know you've heard that Scott sax solo before and Carlton's guitar frills are like old boring acquaintances you try not to see on the subway platform.

If you listen to "Black Cow" a second time, however, the fact that the sax solo fits the song perfectly hits you. Almost as if the song had been written for Scott's familiar statement . . .

And that's what the album is about. Becker and Fagan are moving from the position of writers in a rock band to that of composers in the mold of jazzmen like Ellington and Basie. It's a logical step. The Dan's use of the rock form has always been idiomatic. On any one of their albums, rhythms, harmonic structures, and even melodies have been constructed with clichés or 'genres' in mind. In freeing themselves from a set group of musicians they have only enlarged their scope.

There are still a few bugs in the system though. Their log-thumping bass player is one of them. He tends to put lead boots on the entire rhythm section. And there are a pair of up-tempo Sunshine Band numbers which you can put scratches through after the first listening.

Bebop boopadrops

Last Saturday evening Seneca College played host to two up and coming 'progressive' British rock bands. Neither City Boy and Be Bop Deluxe have yet achieved mass popularity in North America but their local cult followings were enough to sell out the Field House, Toronto's second largest concert barn.

Be Bop Deluxe have achieved stardom in their homeland with their futuristic narratives and the excellent guitar playing of their leader, Bill Nelson. One expected, as a result, a tour de force performance when they opened their act with synthesized sounds and impressive visuals comprised of scenes from classic science fiction movies. Unfortunately, this initial promise dissolved less than half way through the show. After achieving a peak early in the show, with the majestic 'Sister Seagull', they soon lost their punch and their direction. The band chose to ignore their best numbers, such as 'Axe Victim', 'Ships in the Night' and 'Modern Music', in order to play repetitious instrumentals and tedious blues.

At his best, Bill Nelson is capable of beautiful and concise solos, but the endless riffing that characterized the set was enough to make the band sound like any one of the countless Led Zeppelin imitators presently in vogue. The impression left by their poorly paced performance was that Be Bop has already exhausted their initially exciting concepts. Ever since their first album Be Bop have purported to be space age rock, but without Nelson's flashy guitar effects their music is merely tired rhythm and blues. Their current grey flannel image illustrates the essentially conservative nature of their music which has as little to do with the cosmos as does Star Wars.

City Boy, the opening act of the evening, promised much less than Be Bop but it was their music that turned out to be the most substantial. The band is a tight and energetic one and their material, though too often reminiscent of the cabaret, is memorable and to the point. Like Be Bop, City Boy features an impressive guitarist, but unlike Nelson, Mike Slamer's solos were brief and exciting. City Boy's weakness lies in their often embarrassing stage show. Though dual lead vocalists Lol Mason and Steve Broughton are strong singers, they come off looking like Vaudeville performers.

Virtually unknown in England, City Boy are from the Supertramp-Joe mould of rock. Their songs are similarly intelligent but are done with tongue in cheek. They thankfully do not attempt the weighty concepts that have marred recent Supertramp albums. By the overwhelming response they received Saturday night, they are already on the road to Supertramp's level of success.

But there is the title cut which features and is centred on Wayne Shorter's Coltranesque tenor. The tune moves between the poles of pentatonic scale structure and Latin rhythms, Shorter's prime influences. The song is his and when he starts to bow it flies.

Nothing else is that good but the groundwork is laid. We can start waiting for the next one.

Steve Martin sees the world through rose-coloured Handi-Wipes. He's the guy in your high school lunch room who'd smear his Spam sandwich under his arms to get a laugh. He says he gets in a funny mood for the stage by sticking a slice of baloney in each shoe. He also has the most diverse audience of any of today's comics; the cretins love him because he speaks their language, and the eggheads find it amusing to watch a lesser being humiliate itself.

In the stinking miasma of tired old shit that is modern comedy (ranging from Bob Hope's machine gun gag spew; through the Cosby-Carlin "ramble on until I say something poignant and-or funny" type; to the "new generation" of seemingly cloned comics like Kip Addota and Kelly Monteith), Martin sticks out like a bad case of piles. His style is hard to pigeonhole, but maybe I should describe it as a gamma ray mutant hybrid of slapstick, wit and Silly Putty. And maybe I shouldn't.

If you've never seen Martin, you must have an early beddy-bye time, because he's been doing the late-night talkie circuit for years. If you've seen him and don't like him, you're a depressing little scumshit whose idea of fun is doing the Mad Magazine fold-in. If you love him, "huff said.

Let's Get Small, this dupa's first album, is not a "Best Of..." collection, as it contains a lot of new material. But whine not, for this new stuff, along with classic bits like his sadly infrequent frenetic banjo playing (see esp. "Ramblin' Guy"), "Excuse Me", and "My Gramma's Song" are sure to warm the cockles of that vacant little pus-bag you call a brain.

Sadly, the visual element, which is about half of Martin's act, is missing (in case you couldn't figure that out for yourself). His amorphous leering-crazed-retarded visage; a beard on half of his face, ("So I won't be recognized in airports") the arrow through the head, and his spastic tap-dancing "I've got HAPPY feet" number, are as important to his aura of fresh lobotomy as anything he says.

For that reason, this is not a great disc (we'll have to wait until home video records are a commercial reality for that). But it does beat turds out of the competition (including rock records) in the scramble for your clummy pesos. Go on, give it to the brain damaged person in your life.

In "Baltimore" and "Sigmund Freud's Impersonation..." Newman seems to follow in Neil Young's line of setting American cities to music. The unexpected insertion of the last line of "White Christmas" into "Sigmund Freud's Impersonation..." demonstrates that Newman's taste for irony has survived the liberal drubbing his Good Ol' Boys took three years ago.

Newman needs to work on his melodies. They are often so minimal as to be non-existent and so boring as to get in the way of his words. He simply is not trying and he is the first to admit this. Someone who can write a song about a sex pervert and set it to "Love Story"-like music obviously has something to offer. This album has something to offer too but the failures in it are disturbing, particularly since he took three years to make it.

Bad Reputation finds black Irishman Phil Lynott once again taking pen and the Concise Oxford Guide to Great Modern Poetry in hand, and giving forth with his usual heavy metal ballad-mini-epics. It's nothing new for Lizzy, what with Phil and the boys cranking up their forgettable metallic schlub-schlub in the background while the former weaves some scaled down Odyssean tale about everyday stuff that you always wanted to hear described in puffy, pretentious lyrics. But tell me one thing, is this Phillip fellow, with a book of poetry on the market (entirely of lyrics from previous Lizzy tunes), the same guy who used to be called Phil and who penned one of the all time great anthems, "The Boys Are Back in Town"?

You know it's funny. A lot of Lizzy tunes reflect their native Ireland's various preoccupations, such as war and religion (see this album's "Soldier of Fortune" and "Dear Lord"). You'd think they'd also contain themes of violence and danger. Instead what you get is a group that lyrically and musically seems to come at you through a porridge filter. At least their Jailbreak and Johnny the Fox discs had some guts. This abortion packs as much punch as an Ovaltine enema.

The way I figure it, Lynott is torn between being sensitive and lyrical, sorta being like fellow Irishman Van Morrison and the next Gene Simmons. So he compromises by writing sensitive hard songs, a contradiction he's just not talented enough to pull off.

The smart money labels Thin Lizzy as just another crap group with one good song and says that their album is for heavy metal fans concerned about their hearing. Ignore them. Better yet, send the group and the disc back home, so the kids can use them for target practice (the guys as moving targets, and the vinyl as skeets). All rett.

Whodunnit

Thank God for solo albums. If not for them, the Who would not be the world's greatest rock band. Solo albums allow the group's members a medium in which they can explore that side of their musical style which has no place within that specific group context that is the Who.

Solo albums have allowed Roger Daltrey the opportunity to sing trite pop tunes, given John Entwistle the chance to play out his darker side and let Keith Moon run even more wild than usual. To a large extent these elements could seriously dampen a group effort, but they thankfully are exercised in outside efforts.

The solo album is especially vital in the case of Pete Townsend because he is the band's major song-writer. He has many musical ideas which don't fit into the Who's style, so rather than force them on the group, he sensibly pursues them on his own.

Rough Mix (like his first solo album, Who Came First) is a collaboration with Ronnie Lane; writing, singing and playing is shared on an equal basis. Not unexpectedly (considering both are guitar players) the high points of the album are the guitar stylings and technique. However the writing is extremely poor. One song, "Till The Rivers All Run Dry", is so hokey and plain, that I am sure it is a joke. But then on this album a lot of the material seems to have been done by musicians caught in a rather silly mood.

You wish that "My Baby Gives It Away" was done by the Who. Instead Townsend himself plays all the instruments and does the singing. The result is perilously inadequate drums, bass and vocals. It is saved by a brilliant acoustic guitar and a nice sleazy lead. Too bad it receives such mediocre treatment, because it's the best written song on the album.

Townsend's "Street in the City" merely emphasizes the point that popular music requires an orchestral arranger who can write a non-cliche-ridden score.

Lane does several ballads, all extremely simple and saved only by the natural variety and fluctuation of his voice. Both Townsend and Lane have flat and weak voices, but Townsend's is especially plain. Lane's saving grace is his interesting variation of tone and colour.

The album is extremely erratic. I can safely say that my friends can spill tar on the second side of my copy, and I would not be extremely upset and the first side has only a few moments worth saving.

I am glad that the musical ideas contained on this album are safely sealed in vinyl; now maybe Townsend can get back to the important task of a new Who album.

Steve Petranik

Gnu gNewman

Randy Newman, on his new album Little Criminals is moving towards minimalist impressionism. The worst examples of this are "I'll Be Home" and "You Can't Fool The Fat Man". "I'll Be Home" is a Paul Simon-like song sung with a raspy voice with the title sung ten times in the course of it. The lack of development just might make you go to sleep, don't you think? "You Can't Fool The Fat Man" naturally reminds me of Sidney Greenstreet in the Humphrey Bogart movies but that still doesn't save the song. For the sake of brevity Newman pares the story to twenty lines and consequently imparts less information and impressions than a commercial. We never get involved.

Some of the songs are thematically tied to the title song "Little Criminals". "Short People" is probably Newman's funniest song and is highlighted by one-liners most Las Vegas comedians would pant for. It's also the most fleshed out song on the album, with percussion, orchestration, a good melody and those Hollywood cowboys, the Eagles. Two songs that concern themselves with girls also succeed. In "Texas Girl" Newman abandons his own sloppy piano-playing for the sake of the mood and lets Ralph Grierson handle it. In one of the more celebrated songs on the album "In Germany Before The War" Newman's lyrics and orchestration work against each other so advantageously that the effect is Toronto welcomed back one of its own last Friday night. After a self-imposed exile from the club-concert circuit, Domenic Troiano broke loose at the Colonial, with a new band, to attempt what some have called his last stab at super success. Troiano has had more than the average number of chances, and maybe, just maybe, he'll do it this time.

A child of the sixties, that infant era of the Canadian rock music industry, Troiano has moved in and out of various bands so often that his bio-sheet reads like the chronology of the industry itself. From his early initiation with Ronnie Hawkins, to sojourns with Mandella, Bush, James Gang and The Guess Who, interspersed with his own solo ventures, he has garnered the experience and hard knocks that show in the music that has evolved into a characteristic Troiano-style.

The formation of The Domenic Troiano Band is sort of the culmination of the inevitable; his chance to take on what he could not seem to do within the ranks of someone else's organization. Troiano, a 'black sheep loner', has never felt comfortable in the confines of one band and one stream of music. He explains this in terms of individuality. He says he "never wanted to be just a guitar player. I want to create music, to influence it. Having my own band is something I've looked forward to for a long time. It's a musical situation where I can touch all the bases and move in any direction I want."

The music is rife with the ghosts of bands past. At the Colonial it was possible to detect and feel the juxtaposition of each member's formative influences, against a new glossy sophistication that unfortunately may be too much for Toronto's fickle audiences. That fact doesn't bother Troiano too much because he retorts "We're not a bar band, we're a concert band". He however, acknowledges that clubs are "the best thing for you when you're just starting out. They give you time to tighten up".

The recent album, Burning at the Stake, was fettered only briefly during the double set. Instead the band set loose exploratory numbers, which were well-received to the extent that they did not seem to need the 'tightening up experience' of the club atmosphere. Each knew where the others were going. They were able to lead their audience at will through Friday night without any objections whatsoever.

Live, it's not background music. The album however, provides the usual middle-of-the-road sound, commercial orientation being what it is. But, as with most acts, the on-stage opportunity is the true test of ability. Progressive Jazz buffs will be those most pleased with the "live" Domenic and, but Warning! Burning at the Stake is not to be remembered for its progressive expression. It is a series of cuts aimed at the widest possible market, so if it's progressive innovative jazz you want, see him in concert.

One member of the Colonial audience summed up the Troiano band debut, likening it to being on a freight train, never certain where it's going or when it's going to stop. Freight train or not, Domenic Troiano has another long haul ahead, with the pressure of his, "Last Stand", an extra weight he doesn't need to carry.

The Komagata Maru Incident: Play reveals Canuck racism

The Komagata Maru Incident is a play about racism, set in the past but probably more relevant today. Toronto Workshop Productions, author Sharon Pollock, and director Alex Dmitriev combine to put on a play that tells an interesting story while leaving the spectator to ponder his own ingrained prejudices.

The time is May 23, 1914 and the setting is Vancouver. The Komagata Maru is a vessel about to dock carrying 376 Indian immigrants. The passengers are Sikhs and for the most part have served in the British Army.

Permission to land is refused by the authorities in a misguided attempt to keep Canada pure, white Anglo-Saxon, and Protestant. A court case ensues and again the visitors are refused entry; they are left in the harbour without food or water. Trumped up charges of mutiny are produced and two months after its arrival, the Komagata Maru is escorted out of the harbour by a Canadian cruiser. It returns to India; meanwhile in Vancouver, Sikhs purge their community of informers and an immigration official is shot.

The set in the desolate warehouse that houses Factory Theatre Lab is simple yet adaptable. In the background, a section of ship's deck houses an Indian woman, played by Charlotte Freedlander, one of the unfortunate immigrants. In the foreground, there is a living room where the government official, Wayne Robson, lives. In effect it is a brothel with Evy, Elizabeth Murphy, and Sophie, Jeannie Walker, as inmates. Georg, a German guest played by Jack Messenger, completes the foursome on land. Last but by no means least there is T.S., played with great verve by Patrick Christopher, who acts as a master of ceremonies taking on different roles, narrating, philosophizing and preaching.

Thus, action revolves between the Komagata Maru and the attempts on shore to get rid of it. The action is almost cinematic as one character interaction jumps to another and those not involved freeze on stage. Once the interaction is over, the characters remain immobile and the action shifts over to a new confrontation. This provides for a fast-paced show that is seemingly choreographed on stage by Patrick Christopher, who dominates the play. An important second is lighting director Simon Reeves who helps complete the shift of attention by means of subtle lighting.

The cast work together efficiently and succeed in carrying off a complex production. Alex Dmitriev is to be congratulated on producing a show that is well paced and entertaining, and not heavy-handed in spite of the theme.

One is left with a feeling of shame and guilt when the immigration official says of the Indian Army veterans: "We don't mind them dying for us, we just don't want them to live with us." In the end, it is the white man who once again is the savage. As an expose on racism both past and present, The Komagata Maru Incident cuts like a fine-edged knife.

Drama about drama lacks drama

Robertson Davies has always teased the theatre. He plays with its conventions, flirts with the idea of theatre, scolds his audience and publicly primps his writing talents. Seldom, however, does he give much satisfaction in his plays. Pontiac and the Green Man, which opened at the MacMillan Theatre on Wednesday night, is Davies' latest stab at an art which he loves to talk about but never really comes to terms with. Pontiac is a compendium of all the themes of Davies' previous plays with most of their weaknesses. It is a course in dramatic theory, a defense of a culturally isolated artist and a vehicle for elegaic monologues. But the play only trifles with all that is possible from theatre in the hands of a man with Davies' skill.

Although typically tendentious and lacking the 'soul' that Davies says is essential to drama, Pontiac is not short of some appeal. Commissioned as a work for the University of Toronto sesquicentennial, Davies has chosen a Canadian historical incident incorporating one of his favourite themes — a man of vision trapped in a hostile and culturally backward setting — and in the process has created a mammoth academic in-joke. The trial of the hero and sometime playwright Major Robert Rogers allows commentary on academic critics, French-English relations, theatre vs. reality dialogues and 18th century acting troupes. And, through some undoubtedly tongue-in-cheek casting, the production lets us see some university and media favourites on stage — Laurier Lapierre making a commendable stage debut as a roguish French judge, Brenda Davies as director of a bumbling, itinerant acting troupe, Michael Tait as a sceptical but down-to-earth colonial army officer, David Gardner as the hero and artist Major Rogers and Ronald Bryden as a frustrated actor turned soldier who has much to say about drama.

If you've missed the point, you understand the play. Having never been a parent at a "home and school association" theatre night, I can only speculate that the same sense of uncritical camaraderie and good humour that goes with such high school events must be what Davies was aiming for in Pontiac. He has done it before, with perhaps more success, in two masques written for the boys at Upper Canada College. Recognize the references to theatre history and theory, or know something about Davies' other plays, or be tickled to see your professor on stage and the author has established an instant stage-audience relationship that lets him make all the snarky personal, social and political comments he wants without being judged too harshly.

The problem is that for some, especially if you're outside the clique, in-jokes and typecasting are boring. Others can become irritated as dramatic tensions slip by, too many words are used to describe how a character in a play shouldn't use too many words to describe anything but should do it instead, or a character tells us "drama is the noblest of the arts because it is the most inclusive" and then potentially sublime moments are dissipated by a jumble of theatre styles. Even the actors must get frustrated when they can only parry in the air with words instead of battling out their characters' ideas with an opponent. The most significant tension in the play, between Major Rogers and Lieut.-Col. Valentine Jones, is never consummated. The characters are certainly demanding a confrontation, but the author won't let them go at it. Ah, the tyranny of the playwright.

By writing a play about plays and misunderstood artists, Davies has, of course, second-guessed any criticism. He even comments frequently in the play itself on the pitfalls of plays written by committees that we can assume is also a reference to the limitations of plays commissioned for such social functions as Sesquicentennials. And, like the Morning-Paper Critic and the Evening-Paper Critic in A Masque for Mr. Punch, we are warned to watch out for the "Grub Street Hack", the "University Don", and the "Bluestocking" and also to avoid "the rude bawling of literary criticism". And 'since-we're-all-friends-here', we can all laugh together about the philistine sitting next to us. Personally, however, I think it's showing the highest respect to Robertson Davies the brilliant novelist and the Robertson Davies who could write such beautiful lyric monologues for Major Rogers, to say please stop talking about theatre — write for it.

Town Hall as a temple

Last Saturday night Indian classical dancer Menaka Thakkar proved that you can be losing your bells and still make a stunning impression. In a performance at the St. Lawrence Centre Town Hall, Thakkar and four Indian musicians plus a narrator (her brother Rasesh) created as vivid and multilateral a display of Indian culture as is possible in three hours short of travelling to India.

Through an amazing proficiency in the Indian classical dance, Thakkar provided the near-capacity crowd with a rich conception of the patterns and textures of two Indian classical dance styles: the Bharatanatyam and the Odissi. At the same time, employing multifarious facial expressions, she lyrically recounted Indian epics and thereby illuminated aspects of Indian society during antiquity — the period in which these dance forms originated.

The melodic renderings of two drummers, a cymbal player and an impeccable female vocalist, in acute harmony with Thakkar, served to underline if not fully convey the Indian spiritual reality. To transform the Town Hall into an Indian temple and make that experience fully comprehensible as was intended is an extremely difficult task and so Rasesh Thakkar's illustrative comments were to the 75 per cent non-Indian audience what a white cane is to the blind man. He made the highly esoteric in Indian culture approach intelligibility.

Thakkar, who was literally losing individual bells from the clusters around her ankles all evening, handled an embarrassing and potentially dangerous situation with cool aplomb. Indian classical dancing is performed barefoot and involves a great deal of heavy beating against the floor with both the heels and balls of the feet so that by driving into one of these metal bells she could have caused herself serious injury.

Instead Thakkar showed us the two Indian classical dance styles she knows intimately: the sometimes fierce, always rhythmic and highly energetic Bharatanatyam of South India and the more fluid and softly sculptural Odissi from the North. The dances in part one of her program were devoted to the Bharatanatyam style; those performed after the intermission and drum duet sprung from Odissi.

Dressed in brilliant, many-coloured traditional Indian costumes, Thakkar kept her torso erect during the Bharatanatyam dances while she dazzled with hard and loud drives to the floor. Her physical flexibility equally fascinated and overwhelmed. She produced a seemingly endless series of sharply angular twists of the limbs coupled with quick, intricate flexings of the wrists and fingers. Everything Thakkar did she deceptively made to appear effortless.

The Odissi style allowed for an altogether greater flow of movement both in terms of the dancer's body and the space filled. Thakkar moved in a more circular, less rigid manner and the Odissi surfaced as the more expansive, sweeping form which consequently involved a greater stage area. The double-headed drums used for each of these styles give a fair indication of the sound and hence feeling associated with each dance. The Bharatanatyam drum has the deeper, richer sound at times resembling a definite thud. In contrast, the Odissi drum of the North is light and airy and approaches the resonance of a bell when played.

The evening lacked nothing in artistic excellence and was marred only slightly by being too long for newcomers to Indian dance at three hours. After that it was simply a matter of personal taste.

The Indian society that Thakkar painted during the Bharatanatyam portion was based on the role of woman as only an object of pleasure. Her goals as a temple dancer were to charm and please God and once dancing was introduced into the court during the British period those same goals were directed towards the lord or king.

Thakkar's expressions were appropriately childlike and naive; they were enacted with precision according to the rules set out in the Indian artistic treatise the Nattyashastra and her ability is not at issue. However, this is not an appealing view of woman and therefore I am inclined to suggest that a steady diet of this dance would be undesirable. On the other hand, those dances which Thakkar chose to perform as examples of the Odissi style were something of a relief in terms of what was required dramatically of her.

During the Odissi Thakkar enacted many different characters with equal finesse but the woman she became here was much more subtle a personality in terms of expression and decidedly closer to being a sophisticated seductress than naive waif. Although the aim was still to please and charm and cajole, at least there was now an understanding of intent rather than complete ignorance.

If we were an ordinary store, we'd sell Pioneer, Marantz, Yamaha, Sansui, etc. . . . Instead we've evolved into such lines as HARMAN KARDON, LUXMAN and DENON. The result: the finest equipment available on the market.

If you're seriously interested in a sound system, you don't have to go to every corner of Toronto. Within the university community is a store that offers top service, free technical advice and most important, great prices. Come down (or up) and see me in the Colonnade (131 Bloor St.). I'll be sure to help.

Thanks,
Eugene

TSO well conditioned

If Tuesday's concert was a proper indicator, Andrew Davis seems to have finally beaten the Symphony into submission. For the past ten years or so the publicity surrounding the orchestra has continually stressed the idea that Toronto has a major orchestra. On Tuesday, they played like one.

The program began with a suite from Janacek's opera The Little Vixen. The strings exhibited a unity of attack and articulation which was outstanding. It was a delightful change from the somewhat less than ideal ensemble that used to be their trademark.

The major work in the first half of the concert was the Piano Concerto No. 2 by Chopin. The pianist was Garrick Ohlsson, a powerful player with technique to burn. He was the first American to win the Chopin International Piano competition in Warsaw. Be that as it may, with Davis' martial direction in all its dynamic glory and Ohlsson's rather heavy playing, poor Chopin came in a very definite third.

Ohlsson played very accurately, but he lacked the poetic quality of playing necessary to do Chopin justice. Ohlsson has the most disconcerting habit of appearing to be in intense pain when he executes any sort of Chopinesque flourish. I kept waiting for the pianistic disaster which never occurred; he is, as I stated, an amazing technician.

Canadian composition was represented by Trois Preludes, written by Rodolphe Mathieu. The work is hardly a concert staple but on first hearing (it was new to me) it seems to be one which should be better known. Mathieu was strongly influenced by Debussy, but none the less the composition has been neglected.

The "goodie" of the evening was Richard Strauss' Suite from Der Rosenkavalier. Davis is in his element with the lush orchestration of the turn-of-the-century composers; he excels for example, in the works of Elgar. The Strauss score is rich in every late Romantic method of producing a lush cushion of sound; Davis wallows in it. If conductors ran by mechanical means one might be tempted to surmise that Davis is, on occasion, wound too tightly; but in a work like the Strauss, Davis' sweeping gestures are precisely the thing to evoke the glories of the score.

The performance was, in short, one of the finest I have heard from the TSO. It will be interesting to hear Davis's upcoming Janacek recordings. I hope the qualities evident in this concert will be available for "take-out service".

Array of hope

The concert by Array at the Art Works last Saturday evening came as a welcome reassurance that you don't have to cringe when you hear the word contemporary.

Array had been, in previous years, a group of composers, all graduates from U of T, who incorporated themselves to present concerts of their own works. The focus now seems to be on the performers. The Galliard Ensemble (flutist Robert Bick, violinist Douglas Perry and cellist Paul Pulford) along with pianist Henry Kucharzyk, trombonist Cameron Walter, and percussionist Allen Beard have joined composers John Fodi and Marjan Mozetich to form the present Array.

In terms of musical development it is probably a move for the better; not that Canadian content has fallen out of favour with Array, but the group's repertoire possibilities have been greatly increased with the inclusion of music by international composers. Up till now, New Music Concerts have been Toronto audiences' sole access to contemporary composers, but these represented only the Big Names like Ligeti, Xenakis and R. Murray Schaffer. However, there are others out there and hopefully future Array concerts will continue to introduce works of lesser known composers.

Contemporary music is all too often abrasive and abusive. At one time, art was a portrayal of the cognitions and events of the particular era. If this still holds true, the world is in a very sorry state as the economic disasters are reflected in artistic works that sometimes look and sound like an abortion must feel.

However, Saturday's concert was different. One didn't feel mystified (I didn't understand a thing) or drained (after half an hour of C's I think I felt the total centre) or unbalanced (triangle and tuba duets aren't my favourite). It was an evening of neo-romantic music: very human, very approachable, but unfortunately not all that interesting or original. I felt that I was being presented with a Consumers Report on contemporary music—a bird's-eye view of its capabilities and possibilities in a colour brochure: each composer displaying a musical facet such as rhythm or style through his learned notion of harmony and melody.

Fragments for Piano and Flute by Swiss composer Rolf Urs Ringer was a rather unsuitable collage of styles, heavily romantic and impressionistic. The quotations from Debussy were too obvious to be clever but on the whole it was an excellent piece for instrumental display. Robert Bick's performance was testimony to the high level of musicianship of the players, something that can be forgotten as the listener focuses on the character of the music.

The Variations for Four Drums and Viola was written by Michael Colgrass twenty years ago as a showpiece for the violist. With its driving rhythms and melodic lines, the work is highly reminiscent of Bartok and Hindemith. The energy and precision of Douglas Perry and Allen Beard were exceptional but the work suffered slightly, as variations can, from redundancy.

Christian Wolff's Pairs (1968) was a big disappointment. It's a trendy composition, typical of a certain style of the times: the musicians are positioned in different areas of the hall and become vocalists as well as instrumentalists. The work was handled well — laughter from the audience complemented a rather tongue-in-cheek performance.

The program closed with Nomos II by Thomas Dusatko. It acted as a kind of summary of the previous works, taking out the "fill" and using nothing extraneous to scan the kaleidoscope of contemporary elements.

Introduce him to sis

Steve Goodman is not a household word. He has recorded four albums in five years, and been appearing professionally since 1969, but his public is still fairly small, but ardent and growing. He managed to sell out Con Hall recently, though, and his reception was very enthusiastic.

Goodman is an energetic and enthusiastic performer whose stage manner often resembles a little kid having a good time on stage. He follows his songs with a shy smile or an impish grin, and while he's singing, jumps up and down, throws his arms in the air, does high kicks, sings falsetto, laughs a lot, and otherwise enjoys himself. He has no set order of songs, and drifts from one to another in a sort of stream-of-consciousness style, often doing requests shouted from the audience, or other people's material that strikes him as appropriate. He's not slick, but he's honest and he's good.

His music is a brand of folk that is tinted with bluegrass and country, and Goodman is very much part of the New England folk scene which includes his pals John Prine, David Bromberg, and Steve Burgh. He gained status and fame as a songwriter for "City of New Orleans", which Arlo Guthrie turned into a hit in 1972. He writes with a great deal of humour, but also can be very bittersweet. His voice has the flexibility to match this, and his singing has a good emotional range. His best songs in concert are his funny stories and good-time tunes, but on disc his tender songs are much more memorable. In concert he draws on a background of early sixties rock, 30's tunes, ragtime and ballads in addition to his own material; his recent performance also included some strong unreleased material as well as a few songs from his new album Say It in Private (not yet available in Toronto).

Goodman takes himself seriously as a performer, and sometimes subordinates other parts of himself in an effort to create the right mood and give continuity to his performance. He is an excellent guitarist, but sometimes gets sloppy in his exuberance and comedy; it doesn't matter though, the important notes get through. He downplays the sober, bittersweet aspect of his music at times in order to preserve the good-time mood of the concert. He is no less than brilliant in his ability to handle a crowd, and was generous enough to give a three song encore to fill out his more than three hour concert.

Goodman was joined after intermission by Jethro Burns, a forty-year touring veteran and virtuoso mandolinist. Goodman gave him plenty of room to move around, musically speaking, and the two fit well together. The high point of the set, and perhaps of the show was their arrangement of "White Christmas" to commemorate Bing Crosby's passing.

If Goodman's idiosyncracies are that of a clown, his overall projection of himself is one of tenderness, warmth, and genuine enthusiasm. I have seldom seen a performer generate so much good feeling and sincerity. One always leaves Goodman's concerts feeling somehow that one has made a friend. In spite of his other abilities, it is always this capacity to reach his audience and make his concert halls sitting rooms that impresses me the most.

Goodman is a funny guy, and also a fine musician. He's also a good singer, always an interesting lyricist, and not a bad songwriter. More than this, however, he is a total entertainer, and it is because of this that he is a delight to see in concert.

Steve Freedman

Goodman captured in a rare non-zany moment.

Newcomers mature fast

Last Saturday at Walter Hall the Chamber Players of Toronto gave the first concert of their season and the first under their new musical director, Marta Hidy. When Victor Martin left last year it seems half the orchestra decided to go as well, showing once again the difficulty Toronto chamber groups experience in keeping their members. Part of the interest lay therefore in hearing how the orchestra would sound with changed personnel. It had the look of 'something old, something new, something borrowed from the New . . .'; which augured a less than happy marriage of sounds.

Peter Warlock's Capriol Suite made me fear the worst. The composer's name means 'sorcerer', but more than a sorcerer would have been needed to repair the fuzzy ensemble and unsure intonation in all the parts. Gradually the performance picked up, however; the elegant 'Pied-en-l'air' movement got some neat phrasing, and the concluding 'Mattachins' had a good attack. Elgar's Serenade, Op. 20, is likewise wonderfully scored, really 'stringy' in effect, as Elgar put it. And the players demonstrated what Elgar meant (in the positive sense) by that, even though they might have characterized the music more. About Alan Hovhannes' Prayer of St. Gregory there's little to say. He is a prolific composer, but much of his stuff is eminently forgettable, as here. It hardly seemed worth the trouble of hiring trumpet soloist Stuart Laughton just to play a few phrases, while the strings simply intone feeble liturgical modes.

John Weinzwieg's Divertimento No. 1 for flute and strings, on the other hand, is a witty and inventive piece, crafted to show off the instruments' capacities. But witty the performance was not, because all the parts were sluggish. Nor could they manage effects like the plucked glissandi Weinzwieg calls for. Kathryn Moses was an adequate soloist, but I'd say the contest was unequal from the start. Leader Hidy took the third movement much more slowly than the composers' marking — it may have helped the strings, but not the music.

After a pleasant enough Grieg piece came the only meaty item on the program, Bartok's Divertimento, and oddly enough it proved the best and most diverting performance of the evening. If the opening Allegro was ragged at times, all was more or less redeemed in the Adagio, powerfully and confidently played, and the final Allegro, in which the concerto sections were especially well done. A Rossini encore was almost dazzling.

I don't know whether it was my reduced expectations or the orchestra's growing confidence that gave this impression of improvement through the evening. Anyway you can catch the same program for free this Sunday when the Chamber Players take on the Great Hall in Hart House.

Hello Jazz Fans!!! First the bad news: Yellowfingers is suspending its jazz policy temporarily until the construction outside its doors is completed. Those of us who've observed the miniscule audiences at the club are not surprised. This column will inform you if and when they resume the good music.

Now the good news: the Royal Ontario Museum (ROM) is initiating a series of jazz concerts every Tuesday from 5:30-6:30 p.m. in the Armour Court. Music is free with museum admission. Presumably the idea originated with Moe Koffman's latest release, Museum Pieces. This Tuesday, Moe's son Herbie Koffman (trumpet) brings in his quintet. They play originals and bebop. Lisa Kaplan on flute and Buff Allen on drums aren't bad.

Hart House welcomes the Frank Falco Quartet Wednesday at noon. Frank's fans describe him as a piano 'monster'; here's one musician on his way up.

Frank Rosolino ('bone) winds up his two week stint at Bourbon St. on Saturday, with alto man Eddie 'Cleanhead' Vinson starting off on Monday.

At George's, Bruce Casady blows his trumpet until the 29th, giving way on the 31st to the Rob McConnell Quintet (valve trombone).

Swing trombonist Ed Hubble entertains at DJ's Tavern this week, followed next week by Budd Johnson (trumpet).

More guitarist at Cafe Shoho, 334 Queen W. Tonight and tomorrow after hours features the Joey Goldstein Trio, 862-0199.

Superb flautist Kathy Moses performs a free concert at the Eaton's Centre tonight at 5:30.

Sorry about the terseness folks — I'll be back to my usual rambling style next week.

art

Everybody knows that the real problem with art galleries is that you have to walk around and tire yourself out. Homage to Chagall at the Shering Centre is one solution — offering shimmering, cinema-screen size blow-ups of Chagall's paintings and interviews with him in this made-for-TV art documentary. Engaging and brief but for more details check today's review of the show.

Ambrose Vollard (1867-1939) was the all-round impresario of the Paris art world in the early 20th century. Picasso, Renoir, Chagall, Cezanne, Toulouse-Lautrec, and others all dealt through him. Paintings and sculptures by these artists as well as Vollard memorabilia combine in this panoramic exhibition of pre-WW2 modern art. It's an intriguingly scurrilous approach to these masters. Till Dec. 4.

A taste for the jugular is evident in the Tom Adams paintings for the covers of Agatha Christie novels. Adams also illustrated for Raymond Chandler and John Fowles. All of the 30 original paintings are for sale, including Sleeping Murder, Christie's new book. At the David Mirvish Gallery along with some seldom seen Tom Thomson paintings. Till Nov. 6 and 15.

Gallery Moos features the chromatic diagonals of Rita Letendre, who has introduced spray gun technique to her latter day hard-edge abstractionism. Till Nov. 3.

Saturday is opening day for two new shows at the AGO, one in which U of T gets to flaunt her wares. University College, Victoria, and Hart House pulled 31 paintings from their collections for an exhibition called Canadian Painting in the U of T. Some of these were brought from lengthy storage in Hart House, so you will not have seen many of them. Till Nov. 2. Also showing is an exhibition of works by Gerald Ferguson, a multi-mediaite from Halifax, who uses anything from pencil and paper to live performances and his own body for conceptual projects. Next week I'll tell you what he'll do on Nov. 17. See it to believe it. Till the new year.

Will Ogilvie's paintings and water colours will be aired briefly at the Roberts Gallery, starting Wednesday. Compare the form to James Gordaner's recent paintings opening Monday at the Merton Gallery. Both shows till Nov. 12.

In the Yorkville area, The Pottery Shop features Chris Dell, Ann Emerson, and Tim Storey — really high calibre stuff. Till Nov. 12. The Sable-Castelli Gallery has an exhibition of sculptures by Andre Fauteux, while Chalm Gross's small bronzes continue at the Prince Arthur Galleries. Nov. 12 and 8. A few more days of snake fantasies in Joe Rosenblatt's show of recent drawings at the Gadatsy Gallery, and Dubuffet's 'art brut' straggles on till Wednesday at the Albert White Gallery.

You'll love George Hawken's drawing "Tumbling Mummy" in his showing at the Aggregation Gallery till Nov. 10. D'Arcy Proctor at Nancy Poole's Studio on the other hand, offers some disappointing static high realism. Till Nov. 3.

Anton Soder's lithographs at the new Wildlife Gallery are exquisite in their decorative pre-Art Nouveau subject matter. . . turnips, cabbages, and fish no less. Till Tuesday.

Off the wall is an exhibition of new sculptural form by five of Canada's young artists. Clive Dobson, Janice Flood Turner, Anne Mandlohn, Eric Metcalfe, and Craig Tandy will open with a gala reception on Wednesday night for a month long show at Canada's oldest non-profit Artist Centre . . . A Space.

Shows that you still can't believe are hanging on: the photography exhibit of facsimile prints of Victorian England and the Empire continues till Nov. 8 at Scarborough College's Meeting Place Gallery; the Dutch Cityscape in the 17th century at the AGO till Nov. 13.

Keep on Trucking with Joel at Innis College. We all like his Mack truck paintings. We don't like the price of Innis salads.

Alreet! The big news of the week is that the Nickelodean, Toronto's prime cultural mecca, is continuing its policy of bring top name entertainment to this deprived city. Tonight's artist-sun-lauda is the immortal Stingaree. What can I say?

In the concert department, Queen will be bringing its own brand of choral harmonies and buck-toothed sex appeal to the Gardens on the 21st of Nov. Styx will be at the same location on the 17th. Mr. Shirt-opened-to-the-knee-cap Gino Vanelli will play the Concert Bowl on the 24th. Aeromith, who are recovering from a bombing incident in the States, hope to be healthy enough by the 10th of Dec. to play the Gardens.

Now, for some strange reason, the concert people (no names please), are staging a mess of events at the Queen Elizabeth Theatre in the C.N.E. grounds. Peter Allen will be there on the 10th, Tower of Power (the only disco band besides Wild Cherry that's almost worth listening to) and Chris the Burger will be there on the 19th.

The Friday Stompy Yamashita show at the New Yorker has been moved to eight o'clock on Saturday. Your tickets are still valid. The Hollies will be playing Massey Hall on the 14th. Zippety. And finally, (I always save the best for last), the phenomenal Thin Lizzy will be at the Seneca Field House tonight. Too bad it couldn't have been Kitchener.

If you can't get into the 'Nickelodean, David Wilcox is at the El Mocambo tonight. On Wednesday they'll have the National Lampoon Touring Co. in. At the Gasworks there's the Harbringer, at the Chimney there's the McLean and McLean at the Colonial there's the Steppenwolf and at Larry's there's Hot Rox. Next week, Tuesday and Wednesday, the Colonial will be presenting the much missed Captain Beefheart and the Magic Band. And about time.

And now I reluctantly turn my typewriter to a token blurb for the folkies (I'm sorry kids, but if you like Dan Hill you don't know anything about music). The Riverboat has Bill Hughes tonight and the Nervous Breakdown Cafe has Ted Lucas.

On the home front, SAC is having one of their infamous Roam-Around dances. The featured bands are Sweet Blindness, Doc Savage and the immortal Klekku. Rob out.

Friday: First things first. The New Yorker moves into its second week of screening Cocteau's masterful Beauty and the Beast. Various reviewers in the city have been guilty of giggling about the bad sound and the subtitles in the middle of the screen (perhaps they ought to be called meso-titles). Don't listen to a word of it. Reviewers have to fill their space with something and most editors balk at an article full of superlatives, which is what this film deserves. If you stay at home under your blankets all the rest of the week find the ambition to get to the New Yorker. The Revue has Hal Ashby's interminable dirge to Woody Guthrie Bound for Glory. Lumiere offers In Celebration while the Roxy starts a week of gold-tinted films with Silver Streak and Mr. Billion. The U of T Film people are probably showing Young Frankenstein and Silent Movie again. I'm not sure but it seems like a good guess (so there Mr. Humel).

Saturday: Lumiere, like Leo Sayer, feels like dancing and is probably rolling up the carpets for Magic Flute and I am a Dancer. The Revue starts a weeklong run of Cria, which is a seemingly unlikely mix of neo-realism, phantasy and the psychology of the oppressed (the poor and the young). If you didn't catch it first-run or were saving your pennies you've got another chance.

Sunday: As usual the day presents the impossible choice. Is it the Bresson programme of Mouchette and Pickpocket (the latter one of the few uncontestedly great films ever made) or the uncontestedly racist and sexist but unbelievably funny run of Jazz and Boogie cartoons? They're both in the afternoon, the former at AGO and the latter at Innis. Come evening Innis has that classic of earthy fun The Philadelphia Story. And the Roxy has a tripleheader no one should miss A Fistful of Dollars, For a Few Dollars More, and The Good, the Bad, and the Ugly.

Monday: It's Hallowe'en and no one is showing The Pumpkin that Ate Chicago. Olivier's version of Henry V may have costumes but it's no substitute.

Tuesday: The Roxy pairs Death in Venice with Day for Night probably because they both begin with D. And predictably enough Teorema returns to Lumiere in the company of Juliet of the Spirits. It'll be like a class reunion boys. The Science Centre seems to be having problems getting its schedule straight but they're promising Opera Films tonight.

Wednesday: The Science Centre has a Bulgarian film the title of which won't get out of Cyrillics. Lumiere repeats, so does the Roxy.

Thursday: Things continue pretty much as they were. It's the beginning of the month and nobody has sent me any new schedules. And, as usual they aren't answering their phones. The rain, as ever, taps on the windows as the darkness (unlit by projection) gathers and Wayne Kramer still pines for the light of day.

Three concerts to pick over tonight. The St. Lawrence Centre's Brahm's Festival closes with the Tokyo Quartet, violinist Raphael Hillyer, and cellist Aldo Parisot playing Op. 18, 67, and 88. Starts 8:00, tickets $5.50 and $6.50. In Massey Hall, Garrick Ohlsson and the TSO repeat Tuesday's program (reviewed on p. 16). Rush seats 7:00, curtain 8:30. In the Scarborough College Meeting Place, Camerata presents "Music from Czarist Russia". Tickets $5, but bear in mind that to trumpet pre-revolutionary art is to restore capitalism.

Tomorrow night is your last chance to see the COC's outstanding production of Berg's Wozzeck. OK Centre at 8:15, $5 rush seats available from 11 a.m. 8:30 in Massey Hall, pianist Murray Perahia plays a solo recital of Beethoven, Schubert, and Chopin.

Sunday at 3:00, distinguished Faculty pianist Pierre Souvairan plays a recital including Beethoven's Op. 101 and Schumann's Symphonic Etudes. Walter Hall, students $3. The Hart House Sunday Evening Concert features the Chamber Players in a repeat of last week's Walter Hall program (see today's review). 8:00; tickets free from the porter's desk. Also at 8:00 the CIRT Festival Series features a concert of French music with celebrated baritone Gerard Souzay. Program includes Ravel and Poulenc songs, Debussy's Petite Suite, and Gounod's seldom heard Second Symphony. Ryerson Theatre, tickets $5-$7.

This week's TSO concert features the Bartok Second Violin Concerto with soloist Silvia Marcovici, and Dvorak's "New World" Symphony. Massey Hall, Tuesday and Wednesday at 8:30, rush seats at 7:00. Thursday at 1:30, the Women's Musical Club presents the Deller Consort in a program of Renaissance vocal music. St. Andrew's Church (King and Simcoe), a bargain for students at $2.

By GLYNIS PETERS

As part of the 1977 Sesquicentennial Celebrations you are invited to become "immersed" in an exciting week-end featuring Symposia, Clinics and Games. The weekend is hosted by the School of Physical and Health Education, the Department of Athletics and Recreation and the P & HE Alumni Association. The week-end kicks off on Friday with a symposia on Sport, Morality and the State: The Case of South Africa. Starting at 11 a.m. with a film entitled "Apartheid Sport" the Symposium continues to explore the nature of sport within South Africa under the direction of several experts in this field.

That evening at 6:30, the Blues take on Laval in the first game of the week-end tournament involving Laval, Waterloo and York. The Symposium continues Saturday morning with an investigation into the relationship of bio-feedback to athletics and fitness. Also in the morning will be the Festival of Gentle Martial Arts, A Varsity swim team practice, intramural women's soccer, interfaculty men's football and a chance to observe international gymnasts as they train at the Benson Building, in preparation for The Ontario Cup.

In the afternoon, for the spectator there will be a fencing display and an aquatics sports display, and for the participant a chance to learn ballroom dancing, undergo a fitness test and then relax with a swim at either Hart House or the Benson Building.

At 1 p.m. the Laurier Golden Hawks face the Blues in what could be the final game for either of them.

If you just can't get enough of these great Toronto teams, Varsity Arena is the place for you on Saturday night. A Consolation final at 6:30 will be followed at 9:00 by the final game of exciting hockey. There's a chance for two big wins this week-end and you could be there for both of them.

This week-end, discuss sport, watch sports, play sports and cheer for the leaders of sport on campus... We do it all for you!

Interfaculty Roundup

They dribbled deftly and passed with poise but only after thirty penalty strokes did Meds (2) manage to defeat St. Mike's and advance in the Interfac Field Hockey play-offs. On an adjacent field Trinity edged out New with 2 goals by Kathy Vandermeulen and a shut-out. The quality of these matches augers well for both teams who move on to next week's semifinals.

Tuesday saw Pharmacy easing out Forestry by a score of 1-0, and Sandy Grant of Vic turning in a hat trick to beat Meds (1) 3-0.

In Touch Football action, Phys. Ed. will be playing St. Mike's next Wednesday as the season winds down towards the final game coming up on November 9.

As to be expected, Scarborough and Etimdale, last year's first and second place finishers in Interfac Basketball, have fielded strong teams again. Their competition will be coming from Phys. Ed (1), who are reputedly short but fast, and Rehab. A, led by Carla Organ, an ex-Varsity player.

If you want to play a game, whether for recreation or competition, a knowledge of the rules is only to your advantage and further enjoyment. On Thursday, October 27, a meeting will be held in the Lecture Room of the Benson Building at 6 p.m. for all those interested in refereeing women's interfac Ice Hockey. If women want to ensure the establishment of Ice Hockey as a sport within their domain, responsibility should be taken for all aspects of the competition. Games start next week and it might be enticing to mention that by refereeing two a week, you could pay your food bill. Give it a try!

Blues' Defence vs Reid In Playoff Action

By JIM O'LEARY

There is a certain amount of apprehension around Varsity Stadium this week as the Blues prepare to meet the number five ranked Laurier Golden Hawks. This apprehension stems from the fact that in their last three encounters the underdog Hawks have stole two victories, including a 23-22 victory which knocked the Blues out of last year's playoffs.

The Toronto squad has nothing but respect for Tuffy Knight's Hawks. Knight has moulded a team which relies very little on razzle-dazzle but instead plays good basic football. The Hawks are big, tough and aggressive and will try to intimidate an opponent by running the ball right at them.

In their only encounter this season the Hawks used exactly this style of play, rolling up 286 yards rushing, but were defeated 17-13 by the Blues. On Saturday there is little doubt that the Hawks will use the same approach with the hope of an outcome similar to last year's playoff.

The Hawk offence revolves around all-star fullback Jim Reid. Running out of the wishbone offence, Reid, rushed for a record breaking 1078 yards and 16 touchdowns, if the Blues can stop Reid they will have gone a long way to stripping the Hawk offence.

When the opposition is putting too much pressure on Reid the Hawks will go to their number two back, Phil Colwell. Running in the shadow of Reid, Colwell was the number three rusher in the league with an impressive eight yard average.

If the Blues can stop the Laurier rushers they will have little to fear from the Hawks' passing game. The Hawks ranked below the lowly York Yeomen in passing and did not place any receivers among the league leaders.

Saturday's game will be decided by the play along the line. The Blues will be counting on tackles Angelo Castellan and Bill Burkhardt to control play in the middle of the line with support from linebackers Julio Giordani and Robin Rushton. Ends, Bill Lavine and Ray Ziremba, with support from John Brown and Mike Rossetti, will be expected to keep Reid and Colwell from getting outside.

A good Toronto defensive effort will be useless unless the offence can snap out of the slump it has been suffering for the last few weeks. The Blues offence ended the season with the least number of points scored of any team which made the playoffs.

If Feraday can get the offence rolling and score a couple of early touchdowns it could disrupt the Hawk game plan. It is hard to play catch up football with a running

The Varsity — Mark Cheung

The Blues hope Kotsopoulos can have as good a game tomorrow as he did when he caught 7 passes for 163 yards the last time these teams met.

offence because running the ball is time consuming. Catch up football requires a good passing game, something Laurier does not possess.

Getting the offence rolling is easier said than done however. The Hawks placed three defensive players on the all-star team announced this week. Ends Fred Brown and John Miller anchor a strong defensive line. Linebacker Mike Murphy leads a corps of hard-hitting linebackers.

The key to Toronto success may well rest with the Blues' ability to neutralize the Hawk all-stars. This task will fall to the Blues' offensive line, three of which earned all-star recognition. The best match-up of the day will place all-star tackle Tim Allen against the Hawks' Miller. Joining Allen on the all-star team are centre Paul McMillan and guard, Mike Steele.

The winner of this game will meet the winner of the Western-Windsor match being played in London on Saturday.

Blues Face Laval In Opener

By JIM O'LEARY

The Varsity Blues Hockey Team will enter this weekend's tournament at Varsity Arena with the intent of avenging the pair of losses they suffered in the same tourney last year. The Blues lost to Waterloo, then York, as York went on to win the top prize.

Victory will not be an easy task for Toronto as York, Laval and Waterloo are all expected to ice strong teams.

Toronto will kick off the tourney with a 6:30 game against Laval on Friday. While not too much is known about the Red and Gold from Laval, the information available indicates that they will be far from a pushover for the CIAU champions.

In the Dalhousie Tournament in Halifax, last weekend, Laval posted two impressive wins to capture the title. They beat Dalhousie 7-4 and Ottawa 5-4.

The Red and Gold are led by captain, Gilles Grenier. Grenier combines with Carol Labrie and Yves Perusse to give Laval their most potent line.

The defence is anchored by five veterans while the goaltending is handled by four year veteran, Michel Ouellet.

On Saturday, the winner of the Toronto-Laval game will meet the winner of the York-Waterloo contest. The losers will meet in a consolation contest at 6:30.

Whether Toronto faces York or Waterloo they will have a battle on their hands. The Waterloo Warriors enter the tourney with strength throughout their lineup.

In goal they have Jeff Nickelchok. Nickelchok has looked impressive in past games having joined the Warriors with major Junior A experience.

The defence is anchored by veteran Mike Zettel. Zettel is among the best college defencemen in the country and is one of nine defencemen still in the running for a spot on Canada's Student National team.

Right winger, Bill Daub is the team's leading scorer and with veterans Eric Brubacher, Ken Green and John Campbell round out a good attack.

The ideal matchup for Saturday's final would be York versus Toronto. York would love to defeat the Blues in their own rink before a full house.

After being ranked number two throughout most of last season, York looks even stronger this year. York has bolstered a veteran squad with the addition of a couple of proven players.

Leading the list of returnees is goalie Steve Bosco. Bosco will be remembered for the years he spent tending goal for the Toronto Marlboroughs. On defence, Dave Chaik, Roger Dorey and Chris Kostka anchor a solid rearguard. The forwards are led by veterans Romano Carlucci (drafted by San Diego of the WHA), Aidan Faltley

All-Star Team Announced

Toronto's offensive line received the best compliment possible when three of its members were elected to the Ontario-Quebec Intercollegiate Football Conference all-star team announced this week.

The all-star selections were led by veteran centre Paul McMillan. The Faculty of Education student also doubles as the team's punter.

For tackle Tim Allen, the all-star selection was the second in as many years. It will probably not be the last for the six foot two, 240 pound junior. For guard Mike Steele the selection is the culmination of years of hard work. At six feet, 215 pounds, many said he was too small to make it on the offensive line. His latest honour has proven the critics wrong.

1977 ALL-STAR TEAM
OFFENCE

Centre — Paul McMillan, Toronto; Guards — Mike Steele, Toronto; Don Richardson, Western.
Tackles — Tim Allen, Toronto; Terry Davis, Western.
Tight End — Craig Labbett, Western.
Quarterback — Jamie Bone, Western Running Backs — Jim Reid, Laurier; Ross Tripp, Western; Mark Brown, Guelph.
Wide Receivers — Chris Kotsopoulos, Toronto; Bruce Walker, Windsor.
Punter — Scott Essery, Windsor.
Place Kicker — Jerry Gulyes, Laurier.

DEFENCE

Tackles — Jim Lynn, Windsor; Claude Riopelle, Western.
Ends — Fred Brown, Laurier; John Miller, Laurier.
Linebackers — John Priestner, Western; Tim Maitre, Windsor; Duncan MacKinlay, Western; Mike Murphy, Laurier.
Halfbacks — Dmitry Kurilsky, Western; Angelo Kloussis, York; Jim Cimba, Windsor; Bob Hultgren, McMaster.

All-star, Tim Allen

The Varsity

(past Marlie), Bob Fukumoto, Gary Gill (drafted by Atlanta Flames) and John Goodish.

To date the Yeomen have looked less than impressive in splitting a series with Ohio State and tying Guelph in exhibition action. In Ohio last weekend the Yeomen lost 8-4 and won 6-4. They tied Guelph 3-3 on Wednesday.

The winner of the tournament will receive the Norman Ringham Trophy. Norman Ringham was associated with the Toronto hockey team for a number of years before his death a year ago last Christmas.

Laval's big line of Yves Perusse, Carol LaBrie and Gilles Grenier.

Scar. Beats St. Mikes

By JIM O'LEARY

Quarterback Jim McLeod came off the bench in the third quarter to lead the Scarborough College Maroons to a 9-7 victory over St. Mike's, in a game played on the back campus Thursday afternoon. McLeod, who was sidelined with a back injury for the first half, marched the Maroons downfield to a game winning touchdown.

McLeod's heroics were made necessary after St. Mike's jumped into a halftime lead. St. Mike's scored first in the second quarter on a short run by Andy Lubinski. The convert was made by quarterback John Leon.

Scarborough narrowed the score just before the half when McLeod kicked a 35 yard field goal. The field goal capped a drive which was highlighted by two successful third down gambles.

Shard McKee scored Scarborough's only touchdown on a one yard plunge. The convert was missed by McLeod.

With only minutes left in the game and trapped deep in their own end St. Mike's started a drive which almost culminated in a game winning fieldgoal. Leon connected on a long pass and run play which covered 50 yards. After running for an additional first down to the Scarborough 23 yard line St. Mike's elected to try a field goal on second down with only 40 seconds left on the clock. Leon's attempt was deflected at the line of scrimmage and went wide, ruining all chance of a comeback.

As well as winning on the field, Scarborough also scored a victory on the sideline when a Scarborough fan shut up a heckler with a punch in the mouth. The heckler, who was reported to be an engineer, was on his way to football practice when the incident occurred.

Visa fee hike slammed called "lesser of two evils"

By LEON KING

A strong condemnation of the differential fees charged to foreign students in this province was voiced by the Academic Affairs Committee of the Governing Council last Thursday. All agreed, though, that the Ontario government had bound the university into charging the higher fees as the lesser of two evils.

Said government appointee John Basset, who described himself as "a strong Tory": "I don't think our rulers have the brains that God gave geese!" He added that he recently met with Harry Parrott, Minister of Colleges and Universities and did not think the honorable minister would change his views on university fees, in spite of an upcoming review of the policy by his ministry.

All tacitly agreed that the 20 per cent decrease this year in the number of visa applicants to U of T is damaging to the cultural life of the university. Certainly, as U of T Provost Donald Chant said in an open letter to Academic Affairs chairman Michael Bliss, the fee increase has no academic merit.

Either foreign students pay their increased fees, or all students receive less in terms of lab materials and tutors said Professor Tom Langan. To have absorbed the fee increase for foreign students alone would have required approximately half a million dollars this year, and an additional half million dollars a year to a limiting figure of about $2 million a year in four years.

To offset the disastrous effect of the fee increase, the committee approved an additional $100,000 in bursary funds to be made available to foreign students this year. Seventy per cent of that amount went to graduate students and 30 per cent to undergraduates.

Council also approved a 10 per cent quota on foreign students in the Faculty of Nursing. Its purpose seemed unclear as the number of qualified applicants to the school of nursing has always been far below the 10 per cent level, but it was felt that the quota would help ensure a reasonable mix of non-Canadians in the faculty.

Also approved in principle was the possible posthumous promotion of an associate professor to full professor in light of his achievements. Dean Etkin said that the action had precedence in that students in the past had been granted a degree, even though they had failed to survive the year, since their examination marks were in order.

The motion that "students be included on tenure committees" was announced by student representative Michael Treacy at the end of the meeting. Treacy said he would raise the controversial issue at the next meeting.

Ford's Toronto talk

By DAVID ROSENBAUM

Former U.S. President Gerald R. Ford said here yesterday that he had "grave reservations" about the recent Soviet-American declaration on the Middle East. He was addressing a press conference at the Sheraton Centre Hotel prior to a speaking engagement for the State of Israel Bonds Interfaith dinner honoring J. Douglas Creighton, publisher of the Toronto Sun. Ford said he believed the procedures followed by himself and former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger in the Middle East were "potentially more productive" than those of the present administration.

Ford, who said he is "healthy and I intend to stay healthy" intimated that he would run for the Republican nomination for President of the United States in 1980, but felt it was "inappropriate" for him to make any commitment at this time.

He did, however, criticize the Carter administration on a wide variety of subjects including policy towards South Africa. He said he felt it is important to maintain ties with South Africa for the purposes of trying to solve the problems of Rhodesia and Namibia. Nevertheless he expressed his personal abhorrence of racial policy in South Africa.

Exile on S. African sports

By REGINA HICKL-SZABO

"Sports in South Africa is tightly interwoven with apartheid," stated Dr. Cecil Abrahams, South African exile and Vice-President of the South African Non-Racial Olympic Committee (SANROC). Abrahams was speaking in a symposium "Sport, Morality and the State" last Friday at University College. He is also a professor at Bishop's University in Quebec.

Abrahams spoke fervently against the apartheid system in South Africa, saying that it "systematically and cruelly separates the races in every way." Sports facilities can hardly be imagined," he declared. "We have no grounds to practice on."

Abrahams told of the time he was arrested in South Africa because he and some friends were found playing cricket on an empty green field. (Abrahams is black and as such was only permitted to play on sand pits.) "After being taken to the police station, I got a few kicks in my stomach."

"We have no coaching," Abrahams continued, "because there are no opportunities for blacks to learn to teach. But whites have all of this." The professor went on to say that all white tennis players in South Africa have their own tennis courts, just as white golfer Gary Player has his own course.

"Sport is the most important religion in South Africa," he continued. "The South African sportsman is fanatical. He's playing at a religion."

The speaker explained that blacks used spectator sport events as a means of political protest, by supporting "overseas teams." But blacks have now been barred from attending games, he said.

"Since 1875 only whites have had access to international sports," said Abrahams. "They have to show their superiority." Blacks are not selected for international teams.

In 1956 came the first successful challenge by the South African Non-Racial Table Tennis Federation against the prevention of blacks from international competition. Their appeal was accepted. That year the South African delegation was expelled by the International Table Tennis Federation, related Abrahams.

In 1962 SANROC was founded "to ensure that South Africa gets expelled from the Olympics." Since 1968, when South Africans were barred from the Mexico Olympics, this "isolation policy" has escalated. No South African competed in the 1972 Munich Olympiad.

After 1972, the South African government instituted a "multinational sports policy," to encourage interaction in sports between whites, blacks and asiaties in South Africa — "the biggest hoax ever" according to Abrahams. He related that an Indian golf champion, Papoia Sewgolum, was awarded his trophy through a window as he stood outside in the rain. "The whites didn't want smelly Indian sweat in their clubhouse," explained Abrahams.

Bruce Kidd, assistant professor of physical education at U of T, spoke on the "Glen Eagles agreement" and its implications for Canadians. "The decision of the Canadian government not to support sport relations with South Africa is resented by many Canadian athletes," said Kidd.

He went on to explain that sports is a moral issue, and that there should be "equality of the starting line." "Those who deny this," said Kidd, "cannot be considered sportsmen or sportswomen."

Kidd emphasized that boycotting sports in South Africa is the only effective method to show non-support of the South African government.

When asked how he felt the Canadian government could justify their support of South African commercial relations, Abrahams replied: "With Canadian investments in South Africa up to $1 billion today, I can only say the Prime Minister has turned a blind eye on the South African situation. "We've passed the midnight hour," concluded Abrahams. "Only an arms struggle will solve the South African situation, but sports, a 'super-religion', can bring about change."

In response to a question about his opinions on the current crisis of Canadian unity, Ford remarked that he did not think it was right for a former president of the United States to comment on such a "sensitive domestic issue." He expressed his personal hope that Canada would remain united. He remarked that it was "unique" that Canada and the U.S. could have a more than 5,000 mile long border without "a single soldier" manning it.

Little House on the Hill

Understanding politics is like taking a cold bath. It looks uninviting from the outside and feels terrible - until you're fully submerged. Then it's not so bad, in fact, if you're not careful you might get a pleasurable thrill out of it.

Thus forewarned, one gingerly approaches the television to watch "This Week in Parliament" on CBLT every Sunday at 10 a.m.

It's a pre-taped, televised compendium of the highlights from the previous week's question and answer periods in the House of Commons—a sort of "best of" show featuring some of the more pressing federal concerns.

On the Commons' floor, Ed Broadbent clutches a sheaf of papers and strongly suggests a rescinding order to stop layoffs at the Inco mines, even if it means accumulating stockpiles. Across the floor, Minister of Labor John Munro replies that the suggestion is somewhat absurd.

"The minister should know the absurd—because he specializes in it," retorts Broadbent, still clutching his sheaf of papers.

This is the format of the question and answer period. Honorable members banter back and forth across the floor, occasionally banging on their tables while the Speaker patiently moderates from his chair.

The cartel question comes up and Trudeau, resplendent in a beige suit and sprouting some mysterious foliage in his lapel, dismisses the charges from the opposition. With a wave of his hand, the Prime Minister shrugs and mutters: "We're used to facts coming from the Tory party that turn into non-facts as soon as they are revealed."

Where else could one hear Minister of Defence Barney Danson talk about disarmament and neutron bombs in these terms: "We're not dealing with very nice things, Mr. Speaker".

The speaker takes time to remonstrate the party leaders who seem to be dominating the air-time. "Henceforth, questions and answers are going to have to be a good deal shorter," he warns.

The question of national unity emerges several times during the sessions. Secretary of State John Roberts and Liberal member James Richardson discuss the issue at length. At one point, Richardson fervently declares: "If truth is to be found anywhere, I believe it should be here on the floor of the House of Commons," the honorable members lower their eyes.

This week's session concluded with the startling revelation of more skulduggery by the RCMP. But as the CBC moderator in the trenchcoat says outside the House: "It's a never-ending story."

NUS to poll councils on Quebec

By CHRIS STADDON

Recognition of the bi-national character of Quebec and the National status of l'Association Nationale des Etudiants de Quebec (l'ANEQ) was a major motion brought forward at the National Union of Students (NUS) conference held at Mount Royal College in Calgary on October 21-23.

The conference, designed to assess actions taken by NUS on their high priority issues of student aid and unemployment, examined these issues as well in order to determine future directions of NUS. Participating in the weekend conference were seven U of T delegates from the Students' Administrative Council (SAC) including SAC President John Tuzyk, Vice-President David Jones and University Government Commissioner Brian O'Riordan. John Doherty, SAC External Affairs Commissioner, attended as a representative of the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) on the NUS Central Committee.

The questions of student aid and unemployment had been identified as NUS priorities at a conference in Charlottetown last May. One strategy which came under examination at the Calgary conference was the card campaign held on campuses in September to introduce the issues of student aid and unemployment to students and make their interests known to the federal government. 10,000 cards were distributed at U of T. Delegates agreed that student response to the campaign has been good and that it is a reasonably effective method of educating students and lobbying.

Student governments will be holding general meetings on campuses and forming local committees to discuss the problem of unemployment, said Tuzyk and Doherty. NUS, through its Central Committee, and in collaboration with community, labor and other groups, will be pressing the federal government for immediate job creation which it considers to be the most effective means of relieving unemployment.

The federal summer job creation program, Young Canada Works, was criticized at the conference. Delegates agreed more meaningful jobs are required in the program and that a revision of the criteria for approval of projects is needed. NUS is making recommendations to the federal government for greater flexibility in approving projects and for more emphasis on skill development. They are urging that approved projects become an ongoing part of the community and that persons without jobs be the first to be employed in the program.

Delegates also decided that the student aid program should be made more easily accessible. The major recommendation arising out of discussions of the issue calls for the federal government to supply funds for grants to supplement those already being made by provincial governments.

On the procedural level, NUS wants to be included in government hearings into the student aid program. NUS will continue lobbying the provincial and federal governments to move quickly to redress inequalities in the program. The union is now drawing up position papers on student aid and unemployment in an effort to gain student support for its recommendations.

Conference delegates broke away from traditional procedure in tackling the status of l'ANEQ, the Quebec students' organization formed during the 1975 NUS conference at Glendon College. Over the past eight months, l'ANEQ and NUS have worked together on certain issues such as student aid. If this relationship is to continue, l'ANEQ has made clear, NUS must recognize it as a national organization. Workshop discussions on this issue, chaired by Doherty, led to the motion that NUS recognize the bi-national character of Quebec and the national status of l'ANEQ. The Central Committee of NUS will be preparing a position paper on the issue for the student councils and the results of ensuing discussions, votes and amendments, will be tallied by NUS in January. The results should be known by the end of February and will receive further discussion at the next annual conference in May at Memorial University, St. John's.

SAC President Tuzyk feels that student associations already recognize l'ANEQ as a separate political entity and NUS has the choice either of ignoring it or seeking some accommodation. Tuzyk pointed out that student associations are, for the most part, in favor of greater autonomy for Quebec but, he added, no precise position has yet been taken on the referendum.

Natives seek cultural ties with Ontarians

By ADAM KNELMAN-OSTRY

"We are here to create a liaison between all peoples of Ontario," stated Association of Treaty Nine Chiefs Advisor Fred Plain at the International Students' Centre (ISC) on Wednesday. Plain and Louis Bird from Winisk, a community north of the 50th parallel, are presently touring 17 cities around southern Ontario to create an "intercultural link" between the Indians and their fellow Ontarians.

Plain explained that his people were extremely concerned about the development of Ontario's north and he wished to create a change in attitudes held by most people in the province.

"The Ojibway-Cree nation of northern Ontario is a distinct cultural entity within the larger Canadian mosaic and we wish to be regarded as such. For us to do this, we need to talk to other people in order to arrive at an understanding which will create a climate wherein most stereotyping and racist attitudes will ultimately disappear. We are by no means separatists; we never intended you to believe we were," he stated.

During their tour, Plain and Bird will try to clarify their positions to the federal and provincial governments and to any interested groups around Ontario. However, they are mostly interested in making an impression on the Hartt Commission on Northern Development, they said. They wish to impress upon the commission the realities of life of a part of the people who live in the province. "You are not removed from this future development. We all have a stake in this," stated Plain.

The proposed developments include a gas pipeline through the Ontario territory north of the 50th parallel, and lignite mines as well as dams for hydro-electric power which would divert rivers and destroy vast areas of forests. "If we can help get people like yourselves interested enough in these problems to appear at the Commission hearings, then we have half our objective completed."

"You must understand that the environmental concerns which will primarily affect the Indian people, since damage will destroy our very livelihood, are of importance to you as well. All we ask for is an equal say in what happens to the environment upon which we depend so much," stated Plain.

Once the meeting turned into a question and answer period, the two speakers were able to elaborate on certain themes. Bird stated that the Indian culture was founded on the premise that the people and the land are one. "We are born from the earth and upon dying return to it," he said. "The year life-cycle can be divided into four seasons. The first is the fall when the fish are caught. Winter is characterized by the moose, when Indians hunt such mammals for their meat and skins. In the spring, fowl is our staple food. In summer, all animals, birds and fish are in plenty," related Bird. This is why the environment is so precious to them, he said. "The water and sun are the two elements which nurture wildlife. If the water is disturbed, whether it be through diversion or contamination, we shall be terribly affected," he said.

When asked about the bureaucracy, Plain stated that the whole of his people had been suppressed for a hundred years by a department interested only in furthering its own plans. "The federal department of Indian Affairs has successfully stifled the interests of the Indian people in favor of those of the politicians and the bureaucrats. The department should be made into a Crown Corporation with the head of it appointed by the government in direct consultation with the Native Peoples," he stated.

When asked about the future of the Indian people, Plain said that to survive meant to have cultural sovereignty and along with that an equal share in the decision-making process when those decisions concern themselves.

"Deculturation is genocide. All we want is to know what the government is doing before any sod is turned," he said. "We want to protect the land from destruction before it is too late."

Why the Varsity

Capitalism is a system in which man oppresses his fellow man. Communism is a system in which it is the other way around.

Razor blades in apples and arsenic in fudge. Each of us has his or her own ideas as to what to include in Halloween give-aways. Essence of physics student and eye of newton. Aye, let the force be with you.

Tonight is All Hallow's Eve, a night when spirits stalk the byways and CSC148 students stalk the night shift at Sandford Fleming. Goblins have invaded the 370. Our CPU's cease to function and all is lost.

Which brings us to the main nontopic of this editorial (Mario couldn't make this editorial. He got bogged down in The Varsity's policy of democratically deciding editorials, and wasn't allowed to say that the RCMP were making this country into a copstate.) which is, that science students at this university deserve a separate faculty. (Not departments, we have those. Faculties. Maybe as a prelude to taking over EVERYTHING. I see it now, Victoria College converted to a vivarium. A linear accelerator down the length of St. George. Paradise.)

The term "artsie" is about as base a word as one can find in the English tongue. Science students work hard, spend long nights alone with only a book of differential equations for comfort. The term "artsie" should be reserved for arts students alone.

Politicos are always concerned about apathy, and apathetics are always concerned about politicians. It's a loving relationship that helps make the world a more interesting if more miserable place.

Consistency is the hobgoblin of little minds. Or so said Ralph Waldo Emerson who said lots of other pithy sayings, some of which we use at cocktail parties, and others we wouldn't say in front of our own mothers (who are most likely into Blake or the postman or their secretaries anyway).

And speaking of little minds, there are people who actually read The Varsity. Quite possibly these are the same people who read The Toke and the Balcony Square, and who most probably read about Dick and Jane when they were little children. Let us regress for a moment and examine the motivations of one Elliot Farnsworth Sillput, late of L.A., who religiously, three times a week and maybe four, reads The Varsity (and possibly his homework assignment too).

One. It's a drug. Face it, Elliot is hooked on reading and needs help. He will read everything that comes in sight. Washroom graffiti, Kellogg's Corn Flakes labels, the Toronto Sun ... any sort of trash that comes along. So naturally, first thing Monday morning Elliot ties a rubber band around his arm and reads The Varsity. Habit-forming isn't it.

Two. Elliot's a sickie. He actually enjoys reading about President John Evans' non-plans to become the last prime minister of Canada. He gets a special thrill out of reading Here and Now, and plans to attend all lectures on militant feminism so that he can pick up a girl there. Someone who will wash his clothes, cook, clean and help make babies in the kitchen. (According to Elliot, there should be some reactionary elements at such meetings, and he's gonna find them.)

Three. Elliot has his finger on the student pulse. For three years he's tried to get into medicine, and they won't let him in. (Not as a student. As a cadaver. Lots of med students also read The Varsity, and many of them are just like our Elliot.) Seems that they think he's a wacko too.

Four. Elliot has a pet hamster at home, and the Toronto Sun just won't do. Besides, The Varsity is free and the hamster really doesn't mind.

There are other reasons too, but at heart, aren't we all Elliots. Sneaking, snivelling, slimey creatures who prey upon our fellow man doing vile deeds like writing on washroom walls, stealing pencils, sneaking looks at our fellow's problem sets and yes, yes, even reading The Varsity!!!

Then why am I standing alone?

Leon King
Varsity staffer

Thank you

On behalf of Radio Erindale (CFRE) I would like to extend our thanks of the excellent front page article concerning the station, by John D'Angelo, Oct. 24 issue.

It is difficult to co-ordinate an organization of this size hoping to instill some sense of pride along the way, yet I feel the coverage offered by the Varsity has aided considerably.

Once again, thank you and the best in the remainder of the year.

Trotskyists reply

One of the greatest crimes of Stalinism was to infect debate on the left with the poison of lies and calumny. J. Marco Bojcum, Ukrainian dissident Leonid Plyushch's self-appointed defense attorney in Toronto, wants to defend this victim of Stalinist terror with the methods of Stalinism. Insofar as Bojcum's latest contribution to the Varsity (21 October) is not incomprehensible or contradictory, it is manifestly dishonest. But even the most transparent slanders should not go unanswered.

To give but one example of Bojcum's crude dishonesty he writes: "the TL refuses to defend oppositionists today." He offers no proof, for he — along with Joseph Stalin and many a bourgeois politician — believe that if you repeat a lie often enough, that is proof enough. Yet our article in the Varsity of 21

"O.K. So there's been a mistake."

September stated unequivocally regarding Plyushch that we "hailed his liberation from Stalinist terror as a victory for the international working class." In the 21 October Varsity in reply to Bojcum's first brief on behalf of Plyushch we pointed out "the necessity for the international workers movement to defend freedom of expression even of anti-Marxist views." Peddlers of prevarication like Bojcum must pray for a readership with very short memories.

If truth were of any interest to Bojcum we could refer him also to publications of the international Spartacist tendency (iSt), of which we are a part. Since our inception, the struggle for workers democracy against Stalinist terror has been a hallmark of our tendency.

The iSt stands with the workers who rose up against Stalinist oppression from East Germany in 1953 to Poland in 1976. We oppose the Soviet occupation of Hungary in 1956 and of Czechoslovakia in 1968. We oppose the repression of dissidents in the Soviet Union and we have publicized and protested the persecution of both Marxist and anti-Marxist dissidents. When Solzhenitsyn was deported from the Soviet Union we wrote: "As communists we resolutely condemn this cowardly, anti-democratic and anti-socialist act of the Russian bureaucracy. We demand the right to full freedom of political expression in the Soviet Union, the only position consistent with the democratic ideals of socialism." (Workers Vanguard, 1 March 1974.) Bojcum specifically refers to the case of Crimean Tatar dissident Mustafa Dzhenilev stating the Dzhenilev "might as well avail himself of repeated hunger strikes for all that the TL is prepared to do to secure his freedom." Regarding Dzhenilev Workers Vanguard wrote: "Those who raise the banner of a workers political revolution to oust the parasitic bureaucratic usurpers and return to the path of Lenin and Trotsky must be uncompromising fighters for the restoration of the rights of the Crimean Tatars — along with the Volga Germans and other oppressed minorities in the USSR — including the right to return to their homelands and restoration of their autonomous soviet republic. Mustafa Dzhenilev must be immediately freed!" (14 May 1976.)

Bojcum's most oft repeated slander is that we hold that "defense of the USSR is counterposed to the defense of the opposition." No doubt that lie needs constant repetition for we in fact say just the opposite.

SAC's deficit not erased by cutbacks

With rising operating costs during a period of increased service levels, the Students' Administrative Council (SAC) will soon have to make some important financial decisions. The recently passed Fall Budget projected the occurrence of deficit spending for SAC to fulfill its current obligations to the undergraduate student body. The financial situation promises to be an even tighter one, with news of decreasing enrolment and pending the settlement of union negotiations.

How has SAC come to inherit this sticky problem? Until as recently as two years ago budget surpluses were the rule rather than the exception. Since the last fees hike in 1968 (from eight to twelve dollars per person) SAC has managed to build a capital reserve from these unspent monies. Over the past ten years, the U of T student body has grown, creating increased revenues but at the same time, creating even greater duties for SAC to its constituents. Also, in the more recent past, SAC has expanded its operations to meet greater student demands — for the social and entertainment services.

No major services or entertainment programs existed until the inception of the SAC free films project (now Cinema Gratis) three years ago. Last year, an ambitious services commission piece mealed a fairly comprehensive set of programs. Low cost weekly pubs with name band live entertainment; weekly and bi-weekly ski days; regular folk and rock concerts; special room around and tri-campus dances as well as the free film series evolved to meet growing student demands, and also a mammoth Orientation and winter carnival. This year this same series of events is being repeated and expanded upon with better promotion and higher attendance ratio. Attendances of over 10,000 at orientation programs, 1,100 people per week at free films, 350 per pub, 1,250 per Roam Around have served as both inspiration and justification for these new services.

On top of a broad base of entertainment programs, SAC now directly provides or supports numerous social services. The U of T riding school, U of T Sexual Education Centre, Health Centre, two Suburban offices and two information desks are now funded and managed by SAC. The Campus Legal Aid Centre, and Alexandra Park Community Health Centre also receive financial aid from SAC.

Where is the money coming from to pay for this growth? The trend has been for SAC to decrease the proportion of grants and fees rebates and at the same time, to spend some of the capital savings stored up from years of unspent surplus. Since the fall of 1975, several deficit budgets have been projected at SAC. The first major blowout occurred last year, when the over thirty three thousand dollars of SAC's expenses were paid out of accumulated savings. Tighter spending controls and cutbacks are being devised to help reduce this year's deficit. Increased revenues and a 'users pay' approach to covering the variable costs of events have been implemented with fair success already.

Some good examples of projects which have been generating increased revenues include the handbook, pubs, folk concerts, pop machine and the student directory. You may have noticed that you are paying a little more for some of these services. With the high volume of people currently attending events, etc., the savings from recovered expenses have helped reduced costs. We are continuing to experiment with other programs in an effort to cut our deficit even more. (The newly formed Committee on Board Procedures has taken the responsibility of investigating as many areas as possible).

Concurrent with expansion and accompanying cash problems, there is another internal stress. One does not have to be an organizational theorist to forecast the impact of increased programs on the office support staff and student directors. The flow of paperwork alone (i.e. plans, reports, contracts, financial documents, etc.) has almost tripled over the past three years. The strain is beginning to show and activity is a bit frenzied as the often overworked staff members try to meet the increased demands now put on the system.

Given the current situation, something will break if the pressure is not let off. There are two remedies; to stop providing some benefits and services or increase our revenues to meet our rising costs. The system cannot continue to effectively work for the undergraduate student body as it stands. If we decide to cutback, we must decide where to chop. If we want to maintain the newly formed programs we must find the means to pay for it.

My own feeling is that cutting programs would not solve the problem; we would end up rapidly cutting more and more each year until we found that nothing remained of SAC. With inflation affecting labour costs and other fixed administrative expenses, we would have nothing left to allocate to worthwhile projects for the benefit of the student body. No thought at all could be given to any worthy new projects (such as a Campus Centre) and current programs would decay out of existence.

I predict that much thought will gather around this issue. As the year evolved, I hope that you will consider for yourself the pro's and cons of the ensuing debate. It would indeed be a paradox for SAC to strangle in the hands of inflation in what may prove to be one of its more productive years in many.

SAC Finance Commissioner

Fitting clarifies

Thank you for your story on the Faculty Reform Caucus. There is one misunderstanding that I would like to clarify: we do not view ourselves as a rival organization to the Faculty Association. Most of our members belong to UTFA; and some of us, including myself, are active within the Faculty Association.

CUP takes on Tuzyk

CALGARY (CUP-Varsity) — A delegation from U of T's student council (SAC) helped scuttle an attempt to uphold non-interference with the student press, charges Canadian University Press (CUP).

SAC president John Tuzyk head of the delegation, however, says the allegations are "total and utter bullshit."

CUP reported that SAC colluded with the Waterloo Federation of Students (NUS) to ensure that a motion dealing with the U of W student newspaper, the chevron, was never discussed.

In September 1976 the Waterloo Federation tried to shut down the chevron over a disagreement with the paper's policies. NUS has endorsed non-interference with student newspapers but the SAC delegation managed to table a motion to censure the Waterloo Federation at the May 1977 NUS conference.

SAC says it tabled the motion because the Waterloo Federation was not present. CUP charges however the Waterloo delegation made a deal with SAC that it would leave the conference and then SAC would follow with a motion to table the censure.

CUP cites a U of W delegate at the recent October 23 NUS conference as its source for the allegation. Tuzyk called this "nonsense" and said the matter was not even discussed between SAC and the federation.

Tuzyk also denied SAC tabled the motion "hoping it would never be reintroduced," as claimed by CUP. The motion was tabled until the Calgary conference at which it was decided by the NUS central committee to discuss student council-paper relations in more general terms, said Tuzyk.

The Stalinist terror which incarcerates dissidents like Plyushch, Solzhenitsyn and Dzhemilev and which oppresses whole national minorities and ethnic groups, undermines the defense of the gains of the October Revolution against imperialism and domestic counterrevolution. The defense of the USSR against capitalist attack is inextricably linked to their defense against Stalinist terror.

The purpose of Bojunc's vilification becomes clear when he writes: "The TL fabricates the danger of war to confirm its choice of line and counts the democratic defense of oppositionists as a contributing factor to Carter's verbal and military arsenal." According to Bojunc the billions that Carter spends to build up and refine the US military arsenal are spent only to fuel the TL's "fabrication" of the danger of war. Weapons are developed and built to be used and the imperialists will use every weapon in their arsenal as World War II demonstrated. The only adversary of US imperialism that justifies such a massive build-up of arms is the Soviet Union. Bojunc wants to deny this political and military reality because he wants to avoid the question of the defense of the Soviet Union against imperialism in order to be able to do his little bit of "democratic defense work" in the anti-communist climate of Carter's "Human Rights Crusade".

For Plyushch, building a Leninist party in the Soviet Union is a fantasy because he has no faith in the working class so he pins his hopes on imperialism as a "democratic" force. The ISL understands that the only force for the emancipation of the oppressed peoples and nations of the world is the international proletariat. For the ISL the task of building a Leninist party in the Soviet Union and a communist international is not a fantasy, but a difficult task to which we devoted ourselves knowing that there are only two alternatives facing mankind — international socialist revolution or barbarism.

By Howard Kwan

Co-ops are nothing new at U of T. In fact, they date back to the early 1930's.

The university's most notable co-op success story is co-op daycare. As late as 1969, university administrators refused to subsidize any community daycare co-operative services.

But in the spring of 1969, a group connected with the women's liberation movement began to organize the Campus Co-operative Community Daycare Centre. Their efforts won overwhelming support from the campus community.

Sarah Spinks, one of the early organizers, wrote of the initial battle:

"After a series of written exchanges with the University in which important demands were refused, we called a mass rally at the administration building for Wednesday noon, March 25th. We were demanding a meeting with university president Claude Bissell, insisting that he provide $2,000 for fire-safety renovations to our Centre. Before things ended the following day at 1 p.m., 300 people — a mixture of daycare parents and babies, university radicals, women's liberation, liberal faculty and students — had occupied the second floor of Simcoe Hall for 24 hours. Communiques were passed back and forth, the President tried to get away with saying he would help us get the money but the group refused the vague offer and stayed for the night. Finally the President gave us his personal guarantee of the money by one o'clock on Thursday."

Today the centre is self-supporting and its success has prompted the university to make available an additional 100 daycare spaces on campus. The co-op accommodates 46 children and is still run by their parents.

Whereas other daycare centres may operate independently of the parents, the co-op centre gives parents a real opportunity to guide the daytime care of their children.

Co-op housing is another facet of the co-op movement on campus. "Campus Co-ops" now accommodates 330 students in its 30 houses. The Taddle Creek Co-op and Innex Community Corporation continues to grow.

Members of Campus Co-op are not only responsible for the upkeep of their house; they elect members of the Board of Directors and take part in major decision affecting the co-op.

Campus Co-op emphasizes that its houses are not merely "housing with cheap rent". The home atmosphere of the co-op houses and the relationships between residents are other benefits of the concept.

Innis College, through the Innex Community Corporation, is renovating five houses on campus for use as co-ops. Although the work was long delayed, it is now nearing completion.

Dave Jackson, Innis' co-op residence manager, wants to combine student and family housing. He says that he would rather work with the community than push it aside.

Co-operative Credit unions are alternatives to banks because they emphasize service over profit. The Association of Part time Undergraduate students (APUS) has its own credit union, and the UC (Universities and Colleges) credit union still exists on College Street.

The Karma food co-op is the oldest of its kind in Toronto. Although it will soon move from its location just northwest of the campus, the new Newman Centre food co-op will go a long way in replacing it. The Newman Centre co-op is run by members who are required to contribute at least two hours each month. A lunch co-op also operates from the Newman Centre.

The Newman Centre's new community organizer, Pat Trudeau, is looking for more involvement in the university community, and new ventures like this interest her.

Other ideas are in the air. A co-operative bookstore, proposed by Les Nemethy in last year's Governing Council campaign, might be feasible. Guelph University, for example, has the oldest campus co-op in Ontario. In addition to its housing co-ops, Guelph has three co-op bookstores, food services, retail stores and other co-op ventures.

There has been a recent revival of interest in co-ops at the national level. Various courses in energy conservation, food service management, housing, retailing, and other facets of co-operative operation were offered at a recent three day seminar in Ann Arbor, Michigan, entitled the Student Co-operative Education and Training Institute. The event was sponsored by the North American Student Co-operative Organization (NASCO) and its Ontario regional branch, NEXUS.

The seminar was generally considered a success, although participants noted a shift from an emphasis of the philosophy of co-operatives to a concern with more practical tenets of co-ops.

Larry Kazdan, a member of NEXUS, has published a booklet of co-op news and information. Distribution of the book will be undertaken with the help of the National Union of Students.

Kazdan believes that there are practical reasons for students to get involved in co-ops. The training which co-op experience gives students in management is but one of the benefits. Co-ops are also closely related to many fields of community development.

Nonetheless, co-ops are precisely that: a cooperative effort. People must be willing to work together in a successful co-op.

Innis co-op manager Dave Jackson believes that the Co-op model would be a good one for the proposed Campus as Campus Centre. Phase I of the as yet unapproved project calls for a student centre of sorts to be built adjacent to the Sidney Smith Building. Governing Council will debate the fate of the project on November 21.

Jackson would like to see the establishment of a committee, consisting of SAC, university officials, and co-operative representatives, to look at possibilities of using the co-op concept in the new project. Jackson cites the high cost of living in downtown Toronto as an added incentive for this idea.

Co-operative management of such facilities as the proposed campus centre, according to Jackson, lead to several benefits. The added degree of student participation and control which co-operatives entail, however, at the same time involves an added measure of responsibility and risk.

If co-operatives were to enter into the Campus as Campus Centre scheme, the university might be in for a big change. But whether this will come about depends largely on the present strength of the co-op movement on campus.

A truism of the co-operative movement is that the members themselves must be its strength and inspiration. And although association with national organizations like NASCO may help, and although people like Bonnie Rose and Dave Jackson take an interest, the question boils down to the interest of the students themselves.

Grad student s

By HOWARD KWAN

Bonnie Rose is a graduate student involved in "Community Living", an interdisciplinary theme program offered by Innis College. Recently she has been exploring the relationship between the cooperative movement and the university: both in terms of formal "co-ops" and in terms of the philosophy of co-ops as applied to the Community Living concept.

Rose has been active in the co-operative movement for about six years. She says that co-ops grew out of many small groups working together to help themselves in meeting a common need. Co-ops in housing, food, and other essentials were a part of this initial trend.

The North American Student Co-operative Organization (NASCO), founded recently, has made co-ops more practical for students, she said. Rose agreed that one of the problems facing student co-ops, and indeed any co-op, is that students are busy people and co-ops require their time. NASCO, by providing guidance on cost, control and management, mitigates these problems, she said. The NASCO guidelines help co-ops to Co-op bookstores are common at American universities, while few Canadian universities have them.

Campus Co-op Residence Incorporated began in the 1930's after three Victoria students attended a co-op meeting in the U.S. Now the co-op includes 30 houses and 330 students.

Co-op history

By MARK LUKASIEWICZ

In 1844, twenty-eight impoverished weavers in the town of Rochdale, England pooled their efforts and their meagre savings to form the Toad Lane co-operative store. Even in the face of much opposition, the store was a success. Theirs was the first co-operative.

A few years later, the rapidly growing co-operative movement took root in Canada. A consumer co-op opened in Stellerton, Nova Scotia in 1861, and the British-Canadian Co-operative Store opened in Sydney Mines, Nova Scotia in 1863.

One of today's most successful and well-known co-ops, Quebec's Caisses Populaires, was founded in 1900 by a group of people who felt that their credit and banking needs were not being met by the established banks.

Farmers soon joined the co-operative movement. In the West, the United Grain Growers Association, founded in 1901 under a different name, was well established by 1906. Wheat pools began operation in the prairie provinces in the early 1920's. Ontario's United Farmers Co-operative was formed in 1914.

Clearly, the co-op movement did not arise from the "hippie" era of the sixties; by then it was old hat, although it is true that the movement experienced a revival during the period.

Co-ops reached the U of T in 1936. Four Victoria College theology students decided to form the University's first housing co-op after attending a conference on the subject in the United States.

At first the co-op operated from buildings rented to it by the university. By 1943, the co-op involved more than half a dozen houses around the campus. But the co-op was not without its problems.

Primary among these was the university's ability to terminate leases on co-op houses. The university's increasing need for space made this practice more and more common.

So with great sacrifice to its members, the co-op set about the costly task of purchasing houses. Kagawa House, at 24 Wilcocks St., was the first building acquired.

In 1949, the "Campus Co-op" made its second purchase: Tompkins House at 95 Wilcocks St. In 1952, Rochdale House, at 403 Huron St., became part of the co-op. Then came a surge of new purchases: Owen House at 582 Spadina Ave. in 1966, Warbasse and Webb houses at 32 and 34 Sussex Ave. in 1957, and King House at 596 Spadina Ave. in 1958.

The sixties saw even greater expansion; the Campus co-op now owns thirty houses.

The sixties also brought forth a lasting symbol of the popular appeal and dangerous pitfalls of a co-operative: Rochdale College. Like its sister colleges, Pestalozzi in Ottawa and Neill Wycik in Toronto, Rochdale was too big for the simple concepts which were to govern it. The common personal problems which a small co-op can survive were magnified to a scale beyond the grasp of Rochdale's inexperienced student managers. Pestalozzi and Neill Wycik colleges survived the problems. Flagship Rochdale did not.

The failure of Rochdale highlighted the degree to which a co-op depends upon the efforts of its individual members. Other large housing co-operatives were forced to rely more on contracts and agreements and to act more like businesses to survive.

The U of T now has more than just one co-op. Innis College has a housing co-op, and the Taddle Creek co-op caters to university students and others as well. There is a university co-operative daycare centre and a new food co-op operating from the Newman Centre on St. George St.

The co-op movement is definitely here to stay. Last year, Governing Council candidate Les Nemethy campaigned on a platform calling for a university co-op bookstore, like those common at American universities. Though Nemethy was defeated, his idea was not forgotten, and may resurface again.

studies co-ops

get going on a sure foot.

Rose said that co-ops are of benefit to participants in more than must a financial sense. Co-ops she said are a "learning experience", teaching students responsibility and giving them a sense of community too often lacking in the university.

Co-ops are not merely a lower-class phenomena, said Rose. Middle-class groups are equally interested in co-ops, but for these groups co-ops are more of a vehicle: for achieving a greater sense of community for some other purpose.

Because of the nature and philosophy of the co-operative movement, Rose said, the Innis College Community Living program has a natural affinity for it. She stresses that co-ops are nothing new at U of T: indeed the Campus Housing Co-op is one of the oldest student co-ops around.

Rose said that the co-op movement's long history and widespread popularity shows it's fundamental durability and soundness.

Mind, not muscle, stressed in martial arts

By PETER HOHENADEL

Dr. Burt Konzak, chief instructor of the Toronto Academy of Karate and Judo, likes to tell the story about being harassed one night by a group of "street punks". The gang had followed him to a parking lot, where they stood taunting him as he unlocked his car door. When one of the gang tried to hold the door closed, Konzak executed a karate shin kick that stopped an inch short of the thug's tibia. Even though the kick didn't actually strike him, the thug paled and said, "Excuse me, you're the wrong person," as he backedpedaled away.

The significant element of this story, Konzak reminds us, is that he did not use his formidable power to injure his assailant, but only to frighten him away. This "peaceful aspect" of the martial arts was the theme of the Festival of the Gentle Martial Arts, held on Saturday at U of T's Benson Building as part of the Sesquicentennial celebrations.

In a morning demonstration performed by over 100 students of the Toronto Academy, Konzak spoke about the power and philosophy of the martial arts. The physical power of these arts is popularly symbolized by a closed fist, an image that unduly emphasizes the combative aspects of the martial arts, according to Konzak.

An evergreen tree is used in the logo for the Toronto Academy of Karate and Judo. Konzak said the supple evergreen represents the element of flexibility, both physical and spiritual, that is central to the martial arts.

The flexibility of the martial arts was powerfully demonstrated in the opening session. Karate methods of defense against a variety of foes armed with knives, sticks or accompanied by friends illustrated the combative aspects. The swift maneuvering of the students was punctuated the traditional warriors yell of "kiya!" Several blackbelt students also performed "kata," a series of ancient drills that embodies the artfulness of karate movement.

The students were dressed in the traditional white karate "gi," a loose uniform of thick cotton. Konzak said, "You may notice a lot of bowing during this demonstration." He explained that this formal attitude, which extends to the use of surnames in addressing students, indicates the personal respect that the serious practice of the martial arts engenders.

"The martial arts refers to a struggle for personal development," Konzak said. He explained karate as a form of active Zen meditation in which the practice of control of breathing and coordination leads to increased powers of concentration and energy for the student.

In a series of workshops held throughout the day, more than 60 participants were introduced to karate training. Women are taught simple applications of self-defense against male attackers. Konzak and some of his more advanced students explained and demonstrated physical conditioning and its spiritual benefits in other seminars.

Konzak used students from all belt levels to demonstrate karate technique. The aspirants ranged in age from nine-year old Kathy Lantons, who studies it "for fun," to senior citizens. Their range in ability is even greater. Konzak, however, calls his students "people of peace," because their objective in self-defense is to defeat the opponent in the short run, but to inflict no lasting personal injury.

Profile: One-time yippie now U of T prof

By ANN WALMSLEY

David Lewis Stein is a man who joined in the American spirit of '68 as an initiate Chicago Yippie and a participant in student demonstrations in New York, Washington and Fort Dix. He lived close enough to terrorism to understand its ethos — ethical decisions such as whether or not to phone up the night watchman before a building is blown up. Does a professorship in Urban Studies at Innis constitute a rebuke of the protest which he at one time strongly endorsed? Can he still read Doonesbury without wincing?

Stein was then, and is now, a journalist. The scenario in the United States in '68 demanded that youth, the Establishment, and the media make a moral and political choice. This climate of commitment rubbed off on Stein who was then a correspondent for the Toronto Star Weekly and covered the operations of the Chicago Yippies (Youth International Party). It was then that Stein discovered that the Chicago spearhead of the Yippies consisted of only five people. This struck him as perhaps a fraud of misrepresentation, especially when he looked out the window and saw the ranks of youth massing for the Chicago Convention. But then, it takes only one Dylan.

To keep a finger on the pulse of the Chicago riots, Stein stayed in a hotel with Lampe and other movement leaders. When the police ousted them, new headquarters were set up elsewhere. In a matter of days, Stein found himself at the centre of the riot wave. Tear gas, paddy wagons, cops, and screaming protesters were a daily occurrence. He was still, supposedly, writing for the Star.

As the fall of '68 and the winter of '69 hurtled into national youth protest, Stein began to take stock of his ambiguous position as a correspondent and activist. A choice had to be made — either report it or support it. When the Star Weekly folded, it was not hard to choose the latter.

Stein still considers Abby Hoffman one of the smartest political thinkers ever, the poet and spokesman Al Ginsberg was no less than a "brave saint" in his eyes. Stein was there at Fort Dix when Ginsberg strolled out from among the student throng, straight toward a line of soldiers with guns trained on him, and up to talk to the base officer.

Stein was also there when Ginsberg enchanted a crowd in Chicago. It was 11 o'clock in a park and two to three hundred students were eyeing the growing numbers of police motorcycles and paddy wagons. Just at the breaking point, Ginsberg sat down calmly and began to chant Ommmm. Within minutes, the entire crowd was chanting. Ginsberg rose and led them out of the park.

Stein went on to demonstrate at the Nixon inaugural in Washington and attended the moratorium in

New York. The turning point came when a couple from the Infinity Group in Washington whom he knew took a trip to Vermont and discovered that the urban demonstrations were only the icing on the cake. The "depressed proletariat" simply wasn't evident. Adding to this, Stein and his pregnant wife were living in an unsavoury area of New York City, where the sidewalk leading to the grocery store was littered with junkies.

As the number of arrests and bombings grew, Stein saw some truth in the idea that enjoying your life could be a revolutionary act. It was this background of events that

Frosh reactions to U of T

By LESLIE GOODING

Every year the University of Toronto opens its doors to hundreds of freshmen students. What do they think of university life?

An informal survey conducted by The Varsity revealed that some found the experience of attending such a huge institution "overwhelming." Others, especially those in small faculties, found it less overwhelming than they had feared. Some found so many activities available that it was hard to strike a proper balance between work and play. Others found little to do and were bored, perhaps because they were not yet acclimated to their new life and didn't know many people. Many freshmen found that they met all sorts of people, many of whom didn't fit familiar molds and couldn't be categorized at first sight; however, most found that everyone they encountered was friendly and helpful.

All students expected their courses to be much like grade XIII only harder, but they didn't appreciate how much harder until they actually experienced them. Some subjects were "amazingly hard." Many found the lack of feedback about their progress frustrating. Some expected their marks to drop about 20 per cent, but not getting automatic A's was still a shock. A very few found their studies not as hard as expected.

Many had been told horror stories of overcrowding at U of T, but didn't appreciate what that meant until they saw 225 people stuffed into a lecture hall designed for 175. A consequence of the large numbers of students was the lack of personal attention. It was particularly difficult to get assistance at the math aid centre, and therefore students sought help more from other students.

The students interviewed lived on campus. Some found residence good for social life and getting to know people, but not so good for getting work done. It was hard to leave the academic environment while living in residence. Students in Tartu found they could get socially involved on their own time and work on their own time. Freedom from parents was a major advantage. Generally it was felt that students living at home would be lost and miss out on much of university life.

Most of the out-of-town students liked Toronto; in fact, they came to U of T because of the city. They appreciated the many things to do and the proximity to the TTC. However, they soon discovered that the university was really a separate community and most of their life was restricted to the campus. However, they weren't concerned. Only the Roberts Library posed a difficulty for one first year student — he found it "impossible" to find his way around.

buttressed his belief in Canadian Nationalism, hastened his return to Canada in '69, and formed the basis for his book 'Living the Revolution'.

Stein went on to write Scratch One Dreamer, My Sexual and Other Revolutions, and Hostages. His most recent book Toronto For Sale emerged from his editorial experience at the Star as a commentator on municipal politics. Stein won a Southam Fellowship for professional journalists, completed an MA in Urban Planning and is now the co-ordinator and a professor with the Urban Studies Committee at U of T.

This is the Stein of the 70's but it is hard to think of a time when he wasn't anti-something. Even as an undergraduate at U of T he was anti-organization. Although he and three friends were busy cornering the treasured Norma Epstein Award for fiction, (Stein won it three times), he refused adamantly to join the Modern Letters Club, claiming to be an artist and craftsman.

Stein is still part of the youth movement in that he's still at the university, but his ideals "have been shelved." He is negative in his analysis of the worth of the 60's, and says, "The 60's exhausted a whole generation and didn't solve anything." He is now a proponent of each person's "separate peace."

HOUSE PARENTS WANTED

We are offering a challenging opportunity to Catholic couples who are interested in providing full time care for six teenagers.

Applicants must live within Metropolitan Toronto and must have experience in dealing with children, an understanding of normal and troubled adolescent behaviour, and a sense of commitment.

One partner will be free to take outside employment. We offer good financial remuneration, (approximately $16.00 per day per child), extensive professional support, and opportunities for learning.

For details call the Homefinding Department of the Catholic Children's Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto, 200 Sheppard Avenue East, at 226-1010, Monday to Friday, 9:00 a.m. to 5:00 p.m.

Seventeenth Victory

By Glynis Peters

Every year produces a different team with different strategies, but the Toronto tradition of hard work and a full commitment has not altered in seventeen years. Victory in this week-ends competition, makes it the seventeenth time that the Blue and White has carried away the Ontario Intercollegiate Field Hockey Championships.

In action on the weekend, Toronto faced Guelph, Western, McMaster and Waterloo, before securing the right to compete in the National Championships to be held in Montreal on November 4, 5 and 6. The team got off to a slow start in the opening match against Guelph and managed to put in only 3 goals as opposed to the nine they tucked away in pre-season play. Coach Hoffman carefully analyzed the defence of Western, Toronto's next opponents, and altered her game plan to take advantage of a weakness she discovered. A 5-0 victory is indicative of the team's ability to respond quickly to changes in strategy.

Toronto was aiming for 24 goals this weekend, to prevent any goals against and to avoid any penalty corner situations. The aspirations of the team were almost fulfilled as they continued on to beat McMaster and Waterloo each by 5-0 and to allow less than half a dozen penalty corners, thus stopping any chance of an attack by the opposition.

After the Guelph game, the play improved consistently until the Waterloo match where Toronto played very much their own clean and very fast game. Captain Anne Hofland, in her last season with the team was the high scorer. The remainder of the forward line, of Carol MacDougall, Nancy Wehrend, Cathy "York" Brown and Glynis Peters, contributed to the eventual 18 goals. Donna Allaby moved up from her position on the half-back line to score on Toronto's penalty corners as well as blocking any incipient attack in mid-field.

This year, as a result of McGill hosting the National Tournament, two Ontario teams are eligible to compete. Queen's narrowly edged out York to secure a berth next to Toronto, as the second place team. Also, coming to Montreal will be one representative from each of the Pacific, Great Plains and Atlantic Conferences.

An innovation this year will be use of Molson Stadium and consequently, astro turf and night games. These two conditions although affording McGill a slight advantage will not threaten Toronto. The team will be practicing at Lamport Stadium this week and have played under the lights before. Coach Hoffman feels that the astro turf will contribute to Toronto's fast, wide open game. She predicts the winner this coming weekend will be the most disciplined team, able to hold their positions. In this department lies Toronto's strength. The team has a great deal of depth and shares the work load equally. This quality, plus their discipline will help them when they face unknown opposition from the other provinces.

The ladies leave Wednesday in an effort to practice several times at the Stadium before their first game at 6:30 on Thursday evening against the winner of the Atlantic Conference. Toronto won the Nationals in 1975 but lost narrowly last year to Dalhousie. This time they're "going for gold."

In the Intermediate Division, Toronto turned in a great effort but was eased out in the end by strong teams from Laurentian and Queen's. Coach Jane Wilton has done a remarkable job of moulding a team composed of nine rookies. The fantastic improvement of many of these players is a tribute to her coaching skill. The strength of Toronto Field Hockey lies in the constant flow of players from the Intermediate team to the Senior team as they improve their skills.

Looking Ahead

By BARB LANG

Early Friday morning the Globetrotting Blues were eager to reach Guelph University to attend the seventh annual Women's Invitational Basketball Tournament. Teams from as far off as Quebec and Thunder Bay had gathered for a weekend of some high calibre pre-season competition.

With a month and a half of practice under their belts the lady blues were eager to test their skills against Lakehead in the opening game. The team's defense made Lakehead work hard for every point as the offense led by Cathy Heather and Barb Grochowski moved the ball well. Although Lakehead was victorious in the end by a score of 66-45 the Varsity Blues were not disappointed in their performance and looked forward to the next game.

Brock proved to be a strong opponent and although the Blues put forth a tremendous effort, they were plagued by turnovers and an inability to stick to their own game. Sharon Kosmochuk kept the ball at the offensive end with some fine rebounding, contributing to the final score of 74-65 in favour, unfortunately, of Brock.

The team entered their final game against Windsor with determination and were up by five points by half time. Jane Leuty, Sandy Turney and Karen Zellen helped give the Blues their first score of 80 and a lead of 21 points over Windsor.

This Friday night the team meets York in their first home game. See you there!

Mustangs Edge Lancers

The Windsor Lancers came within three minutes of upsetting the number one ranked University of Western Lancers in a playoff game in London on Saturday. With five minutes left in the game Windsor took a 13-8 lead but failed to hold on.

Paul Ford, capped a 59 yard Mustang scoring drive with a three yard touchdown toss to Bill Rozalowsky. The TD gave Western a 14-13 win.

The Laurier-Western match is a repeat of last year's playoff combatants. In that game Western came away with a 28-14 win. This year they will find the going a lot tougher as Tuffy Knight's Hawks are coming off an impressive victory over the U of T.

Laurier Romps To Win: Eliminates Blues

By HOWARD DEANE
and KEN WHITEHURST

A crippled Varsity Blues football team lost 25 to 11 to the Wilfred Laurier Golden Hawks in an Ontario-Quebec Intercollegiate Football Conference (OQIFC West) semi-final game played at Varsity Stadium on Saturday. The defeat destroys U of T's hopes for a shot at this year's College Bowl.

"It's frustrating knowing that there are guys leaving here, after five years, who should have had at least one championship," lamented Blues' Head Coach Ron Murphy. "They have never quit. We never lose a ball game; we just run out of time."

Varsity running back John Goodrow spent a lonely day playing in the Blues' backfield. The Blues changed to a spread offensive alignment, leaving Goodrow as the only running back. His usual partner, Joe Hawco injured his neck on the opening kickoff of last week's game against the University of Western Ontario Mustangs.

The spread alignment had five offensive linemen, two split-ends, three wide receivers, one running back and the quarterback.

The Blues were unable to contain the Golden Hawks throughout most of the first half, but looked sharper during the second. By then they began to settle into the new offensive alignment, which emphasized passing. However, their adjustment to the new game plan came too late to bring them victory.

Varsity had 365 yards of total offense as compared to the Hawks' 359 yards. The Blues earned 360 yards of their total offense from the passing of Varsity quarterback Dan Feraday. The Hawks earned 291 yards of their total offense by running.

In fact, it was the Hawks' time-consuming running game that ate away the precious minutes that Varsity so desperately needed to get their offense into shape.

Dan Feraday was forced to spend the day passing, and he completed 23 of 40 passes. He suffered six interceptions, which frustrated the Blues' best scoring attempts.

Without a running attack, the burden of winning the game was on Feraday and his passing. John Goodrow accounted for the Blues' only rushing. He carried 11 times for 39 yards and one touchdown.

Varsity's net gain from rushing was five yards, because Feraday was sacked four times, while trying to pass, for a total loss of 34 yards.

At the half, the Golden Hawks led the Blues by 17 points. The impressive running of Laurier running backs Jim Reid and Phil Colwell gave the Hawks their lead.

The Blues' defense took too long to get a fix on the Laurier offense, and by that time, Laurier had an impressive lead. Toronto defensive backs were forced to make a number of tackles which should have been made by the linemen and linebackers.

It was not until the beginning of the second half that the Blues showed their talent. Murphy rearranged the defense into a 4-5 alignment instead of the 5-4 alignment used in the first half. This proved more effective, because "the linebackers," explained Murphy, "can read the offense a little bit better, and you have more linebackers to read the play."

The offensive line deserves much of the credit for the success of the passing game of the Blues. They had only five men blocking up front on pass plays instead of the normal six man line.

For this game, Mike Sokovnin moved back to his old position as tackle, replacing Bill Legge. The changes in the offensive line enabled the Blues to send six receivers downfield when John Goodrow came out of the backfield. Feraday's favorite three receivers were Jim Mossop, Chris Kotsopoulos and Sam Sinopoli.

Mossop caught 6 passes for 140 yards, Kotsopoulos caught 4 passes for 88 yards and Sinopoli caught 5 passes for 71 yards.

Bob Stacey of Laurier steps in front of Jim Mossop to pick off one of six interceptions thrown by Feraday.

Toward the end of the game, with the score 18 to 11 in favor of the Hawks, the Blues had a good chance of scoring, but Dan Feraday was blindsided on a blitz and fumbled the ball. Varsity lineman Tim Allen claims he recovered the ball, but the ball was awarded to the Hawks. Coach Murphy protested, "Timmy Allen is positive he had the ball — he had the ball! I think this is one year where officiating has been a bigger factor in turning ballgames around than in any other season since I've been in intercollegiate football."

This was the year that many people expected the Blues to go to the College Bowl. The Blues had many veteran players who will not be back next season. Tim Allen, Paul MacMillan, Mike Sokovnin, Mike Steele, Bruce Pollock and Sam Sinopoli, to name a few, probably will not be playing next year. Next year will be one for rebuilding.

Toronto's most mystified and least supported team have hung up their cleats until next season.

Jim Mossop makes one of his six receptions of the day.

Blues Win Opener, Lose to York In Final

By MICHAEL LEESE

The Toronto Varsity Blues once again seem to have the makings of a national champion as they trounced the Laval Rouge et Or 11-1 in the first game of the annual University of Toronto Hockey Tournament on Friday night.

The Blues gave a great exhibition of their skating and puck control skills as they dominated play throughout the game. The Laval players seemed somewhat lost out on the ice, and were never able to get on track. The consistent forechecking by Toronto hemmed Laval into their own end of the rink and set up many of the Blues goals.

The Toronto scoring attack was well balanced, with nine different players contributing. The initial goal was scored early in the first period by Blues sophomore centre Dan D'Alvise on a perfect set up by right winger Alex Jeans. The red light behind Laval netminder Michel Ouellet lit up five more times by the end of the period giving the Blues a 6-0 lead. Other goal scorers in the period were Joe Grant, Doug Herridge, captain Larry Hopkins, Doug Caines, and Cary Farelli, all with one apiece.

Toronto continued to dominate play throughout the second period, and goals by Ron Harris, Doug Herridge and Dan Tsubouchi gave the Blues a 10-0 lead after two.

Play in the third period got a little chippy as tempers began to flare, but nothing serious developed. The Laval players came to life for a few minutes in the period, but the Blues defence gave a glimpse of their potential by holding off all scoring threats.

Toronto got their final marker of the game on a goal by returnee Neil Korzack. The shutout for Dave Jenner was finally broken with only 59 seconds remaining, as Laval had lulled the Blues to sleep.

After the game Toronto coach Tom Watt attributed Laval's poor play to their late arrival on Friday afternoon, but this was really the case of a vastly superior Toronto team warming up for the showdown on Saturday night against the York Yeomen.

By JIM O'LEARY

The York Yeomen achieved a measure of revenge for the defeat they suffered at the hands of the Blues in last year's playoffs by defeating Toronto 4-3 and winning the University of Toronto Hockey Tournament at Varsity Arena on Saturday. The tournament was the Blues' last tuneup for the regular season which begins on Wednesday.

The Yeomen received outstanding goaltending from Steve Bosco to pace them to the win. The ex-Marlie came up with several spectacular saves, turning aside 40 of the 43 shots directed at him. His efforts earned him recognition as the tournament's most valuable player, as well as a berth on the tournament's all star team.

The Yeomen also received all-star performances from Bob Schurr and John Goodish. Each scored two goals as well as controlling play whenever they were on the ice.

Schurr opened the scoring at 3:29 of the opening period on an unassisted effort. Having picked up the puck at the Toronto blueline he moved in, went around the first defender and fired a low shot to beat goalie Mark Logan. Schurr put the Yeomen into a 2-0 lead with his second goal at 11:16.

Toronto narrowed the count late in the period on a power play goal by Doug Caines. The goal was set up by the puck control of Cary Ferelli and Rocci Pagnello.

The Blues' started strong in the second period and jumped into a 3-2 lead on a pair of goals by Frank Davis. Doug Herridge assisted on both while Wayne Morrissey and Ron Harris picked up single assists.

The Toronto lead was short lived as the Yeomen stormed back in the third to go ahead 4-3. Both goals were scored by John Goodish. On the first, Goodish unleashed a wicked slapshot from the right face off circle, which found the mark. On the second he converted a pass from the corner from ten feet in front of the net.

As had happened throughout the game, the momentum again changed hands with the Blues storming the York net in an effort to get the equalizer. The last half of the third period, however, belonged to Bosco.

Bosco made several spectacular stops as the Blues fired 16 shots at him in the last period. Stops on Dan Tsubouchi and Dan D'Alvise were particularly prominent. Lying flat on his back, Bosco reached up to snare Tsubouchi's attempt to slam home a rebound. He slid across the net to rob D'Alvise who had managed to get in alone.

The Blues pulled their goalie in the last minute but were unable to put sustained pressure on York. In part, this can be accounted for by the Blues' inability to win the important faceoffs.

While he was disappointed his team didn't win, coach Tom Watt was not disappointed in the performance of the Blues. He was glad that everyone got a chance to play and thought they all played well. He conceded that "perhaps we weren't as sharp as we could be around the net," but then again "the York goaltender played very well".

In conclusion, Watt thought that maybe the loss would prove to be good for the team in the long run. Last year he remembers how everyone was touting the strength of the York team "but look what happened to them." The early forecasts had been picking Toronto as the team to beat this year. An early loss could inject a drop of humility which could prove helpful over a long season.

Gov't should wake up over racism

By AHMAD SAIDULLAH

In a meeting of "historical significance", Ontario's South Asian community presented Attorney-General Roy McMurtry with a brief on Sunday demanding major changes in government policy, law enforcement agencies and the educational system.

The meeting, held in the Medical Sciences Building, was sponsored by about 40 South Asian organizations, including the U of T Indian Student Association. The 277 page report, prepared by economist Bhausaheb Ubale, dealt with the violent manifestations of racism, subtle forms of discrimination and proposed remedies. The brief cited many factual cases of racial discrimination and presented them as "symptoms" of a "deep-rooted malaise" which it claims will permeate all strata of society unless swift action is taken.

"Racial violence is quite widespread and has become diversified. South Asians have been attacked in trains, on buses, in their own cars, while walking in shopping plazas, in taverns, restaurants and their own homes," said Ubale. His report states that "the fear that they will be attacked each time they go out" prevents South Asians from exercising their freedom to use public places.

He pointed out that the lack of concern and inaction displayed by the police has done nothing to reassure the persecuted community.

"Some policemen on the beat are very, very bad," he told the Attorney General while many top-ranking Metro policemen sat in the first rows of the auditorium.

Racial discrimination in employment was linked in the brief to the government and media which have both chosen to overemphasize "the negative aspects of immigration." Representatives of the Japanese, Black and South Asian communities pointed out that in doing this, they have ignored the vast contributions made by this particular group of immigrants. South Asians have become a new competitive force, warned Ubale, "and politicians who wish to play politics with racism may become its first victims." The distorted image projected by the media was also condemned by the speakers before members from the press in the audience.

The educational system also came under criticism. The report claims that the secondary school curriculum portrays a biased picture of South Asians and their history; more frequently it does not give any information on the community. It said the atmosphere of racial slurs encountered by immigrant children at an early age can prove to be harmful to their mental growth. It may affect them adversely in character formation, and lead to a subsequent decline in learning ability and academic performance, the brief stated.

The South Asian community leaders expressed a strong desire to be absorbed into the mainstream of Canadian life. Their desire for equal opportunities, respect and dignity and acceptance as individuals in their own right arose from the belief that "stereotypes are stupid." As Canadians they demanded these rights, "not tolerance."

All speakers upheld the view that there is a need to draw together all groups representing immigrants from South Asia, an area with diversity much greater than that of Europe, and address the problem with a single unified voice. This would compel the government to create a framework where there would be "widely spread social awareness" of the problem and the legal and cultural changes which are required for a solution. The representatives from other immigrant communities pledged their support.

McMurtry tried to explain that racism is not a new problem to Canada. He illustrated his statement with examples from the more shameful incidents in Canadian history. His allegation that it is a "universal problem," however, did not seem to satisfy the audience. He said racism is "not so much a legal problem as a significant psychological and sociological problem." He felt it drew its strength from attitudes "which are currently in vogue." The solution, he said, can best be achieved through reform in the educational system. He pointed out that the American "melting pot" had not eliminated Harlem or the Klu Klux Klan. McMurtry's comment that Canadian society was not of homogenous racial stock and that "all Canadians are displaced persons; the only difference is in the timing of their arrival" won applause. He stressed the need to foster "kinship" with the peoples of continents which have developed magnificent cultures over thousands of years" and to acknowledge and recognize their existence as individuals who require "equal opportunity, respect, dignity and freedom."

Osgoode to strike? Sit-in planned over library hours

A sit-in demonstration in the Law Library of Osgoode Hall at York University is planned by Osgoode Hall students this Friday to protest the university administration's plan to sharply reduce library hours.

A meeting of about 200 law students last Wednesday unanimously adopted a resolution calling for occupation of the library beginning Friday at 5 p.m. — the first scheduled curtailment of regular services.

"Certainly the university must reduce its expenditures in these times of limited funding," said Osgoode Hall Legal and Literary Society President Carol Beckman, "but libraries are the last things to cut in a restraint program." Beckman contended that daily access is essential to law students "because almost all of the publications in the library used regularly by students cannot be taken out of the library." She added that law journals, case reports and important texts must remain in the library as they are used constantly by many students.

Beckman said she can "reasonably anticipate" all 200 people present at last week's meeting to participate in the occupation. The length of their stay has not been determined, but Tim Pinos, business manager of the Osgoode Hall newspaper Obiter Dicta, said that the students "would stay for the regular Friday night hours and simply not let it close." Their feelings about the shortened hours, as expressed in the meeting, are "very strong and solid," he said.

A general meeting of the law students will take place today at noon, with three vice-presidents of York University in attendance. The structure of the administration's decision will be examined and, Beckman said, if the university agrees to maintain the regular hours, the sit-in won't be necessary. Beckman said that the money saved from the curtailed hours would be "miniscule, pittance."

She argued that savings could be better made in other areas, such as the York University Athletic Society and the positions of the university's vice-presidents.

York U. Staff Assoc. gets okay to strike

The right to strike may be legally exercised by the York University Staff Association (YUSA) next Monday, an association spokesman revealed yesterday.

Andy Ranachan, Director of Admissions for Osgoode Hall Law School and a member of the staff association's negotiating team, said that the right to strike came down from the Conciliation Officer for the Department of Labour on October 21.

Moreover, he stated, the association received a 75 percent strike vote from their members on October 20.

Ranachan said that YUSA is dissatisfied with the university's offer of a 6.5 percent increase and 50 percent of a dental plan. The association feels they should get "at least what we merit under the AIB guidelines." He added that YUSA wages were rolled back by the AIB last year and that this year York's faculty turned down a 9 percent increase.

Roy McMurtry

The Varsity — Mike Cowger

"If they reject a 9 percent increase while they are making at least double our salary, we should try to get what goodies we can under the AIB guidelines."

Ranachan said that negotiations, begun in the middle of June, went "slowly." By the end of August, with no wage offer forward, YUSA received an 81 percent strike vote. At the end of September the wage offer of 6.5 percent came forward. The university, gambling that there would be no strike vote, was "surprised" by the strike vote of October according to Ranachan.

The YUSA negotiating team is meeting with the administration today under mediator Jean Read. If a collective bargaining agreement cannot be reached, said Ranachan, "our intention is to have picket lines at every entrance."

"We wouldn't go on strike to allow the university to keep on running," he said.

SAC vandalised, pumpkins cause $1,200 damage

The Students' Administrative Council (SAC) has seen the face of the Great Pumpkin.

SAC office staff arrived at the student council office yesterday morning to find that Halloween had come to U of T in the form of two truckloads of pumpkins scattered throughout the building's ground floor. The pumpkins, according to SAC sources, were "five feet deep" in SAC President John Tuzyk's office.

A bill typed on Victoria University Students' Administrative Council (VUSAC) stationery was left on Tuzyk's door to the amount of $4,500 for "800 pumpkins" and labor costs. Alistair MacRae, VUSAC president, denies any involvement in the incident and doesn't know how VUSAC stationery was used for the bill. At the same time, Engineering Society President Joe Lstiburek said he "had heard through the grapevine the SAC office was unattended by a crop of pumpkins" but denied any involvement in the caper on the part of the Engineering Society or their Brute Force Committee.

Tuzyk said that office routine was interrupted for about three hours yesterday morning, since his phone had been ripped apart that same night in such a way that all the other phones were disconnected. In addition, a basement door will have to be replaced, he said.

"The actual physical damage was not that much," said Tuzyk, "but there was some irreplaceable stuff lost." He cited his student aid file containing letters from the Ministry of Colleges and Universities, correspondence from various student societies and the entire brief on the "Campus as Campus Centre" project.

The student council president estimated the cost for repairing the damages at $1,200. His projection included the full salaries of three Physical Plant personnel for the day it took to clear the pumpkins; the cost for repairing the door and the phones; and funds necessary for cleaning the office carpet "which had just been cleaned two weeks before."

The pumpkins themselves were donated to the U of T blood donor clinic now taking place at the Medical Sciences Building and to the Salvation Army kitchens. The prank "would have been amusing if they hadn't damaged so much in the office," said Tuzyk.

Principals urge separate college identities

By ADAM KNELMAN-OSTRY

U of T colleges must retain their own individuality while providing common links for students of all undergraduate faculties if they are to survive as "viable learning institutions," said St. Michael's College principal Lawrence Lynch at the Planning and Priorities Subcommittee meeting on Monday.

A working paper, submitted to the sub-committee by the presidents and/or principals of the St. George campus colleges, stated that there must be a basic set of common degree requirements for all colleges across the Faculty of Arts and Science. Furthermore, the report made clear that a college's identity must be established by the quality of its staff and that its programs meet the needs of a majority of students in that college.

In a controversy that has been brewing intermittently over the past three years, the colleges and the Faculty of Arts and Science have been playing a "lug-of-war" with each other, said Lynch. On the one hand, the faculty has traditionally set patterns and programs for undergraduate studies in such subjects as Mathematics, English, Political Economy and French. But in recent years, Lynch stated, the colleges, which feel a loss of identity and student participation, have been pushing the faculty for greater autonomy in areas such as staff appointments and curriculum choice.

"There have been new programs developed over the years but these don't seem to enhance the college," he said. "What we need is the introduction of more staff in established program so we can get students to take their studies at the college to which they belong," he added.

"What we must have is an equal voice with the faculty in the appointments of personnel," stated St. Mike's President Father J. M. Kelley. Subcommittee member Professor Peter Salus noted that in order to bring the colleges back into some perspective vis-a-vis the faculty, the "first two years should be entirely structured so that the students get a basic introduction to learning and to the virtues of education."

Committee Vice-Chairman Professor Harry Eastman argued that part of the difficulty in working out arrangements is that appointments, courses and financing of tutorials at the colleges are simply symptoms of a larger problem. "What we need is a detailed and coherent plan for the role of the colleges as a group."

Victoria College President Goldwin French felt that the colleges should regain the right to independent appointments. "We must have the establishment of college staffs which will reflect the enrolment patterns of the college," he said.

"The role of the college may be best defined as the profile of its staff in the eyes of its students in particular and in those of the university community in general. This would enable students to identify themselves more readily with the college of their choice." A joint department-college responsibility for planning specialist and minor programs that would have each college offer its own distinct core program was raised at the meeting with the sympathy of subcommittee members.

Innis College Principal W. Saywell stated that the diversity of programs between the colleges is of "paramount importance."

University College Principal Peter Richardson emphasized that the colleges "have two principal objectives. We want more students taught within their own colleges and we want the colleges to have their own programs. I see these two issues as diverging from each other. I wonder whether we can have decentralization of the faculty as well as of the large first and second year core courses." He added that the Dean's office referred to the colleges as "branch plant economies."

Student representative Phil Ryan said he believed there is "a certain bitterness" among students and faculty members towards the way the issue has been handled. "There seems to be a great discrepancy between the objectives and the mechanism to achieve these objectives," he stated. New College Principal A.D. Baines added that a multi-faculty college such as New should be given equal opportunity in the staffing and selection of students.

Subcommittee member Professor Ralph Seane urged that the colleges unite for further action. "Marshall your troops — otherwise your main problem will be not in the determining of your share of academic participation in the decentralization process, but in the decentralization of Hart House, nothing more, nothing less," he warned. Principal Lynch concluded by calling on all the colleges to submit detailed proposals to the subcommittee for future consideration.

Innis program faces unfair evaluation students, staff say

By ANDREW MAHON

The Community Living Program at Innis College is under the scrutiny of a review committee, and there is growing concern among the program's staff and students.

The committee was contingent upon the creation of the Community Living Program, which began three years ago. Now the committee, set up by Faculty of Arts and Science Dean Arthur Kruger, is in the process of evaluating the program.

Sheree Davis, a student in the Community Living Program, said she "doesn't like the framework that the evaluation is taking." Davis complained that students were "not allowed to make verbal presentations" and insisted that suggestions for change and improvement should come from within the department.

"We are being evaluated by people who are not really qualified to evaluate what we do," concluded Davis. "They (The Review Committee) are doing it to us, not with us."

Although only two of the seven committee members are involved with the community living program, Dean Kruger described his selection of committee members as "scholars who I feel can bring an independent judgement." He pointed out that the committee, which has been meeting twice a week since September 29th, is willing to receive submissions from anyone who is willing to submit them.

According to Kruger, "the committee is looking at an academic program and a lot of that information you get from paper."

Paul Campbell, an instructor in the Community Living Program, expressed concern over the format of the review. "We knew there was going to be a review and we wrote a set of proposals," said Campbell, "but there was no indication as to how the review would be conducted."

Campbell was concerned with the speed of the committee's evaluation. The committee has just concluded its open sessions and now meets in closed session before submitting its recommendations to the dean's office.

"The committee is moving very quickly," warned Campbell. "It concerns me the way this thing is evolving."

Professor David Huntley, a committee member, said that "although there is not much that can be said at this time, the committee has been taking a great deal of time to evaluate the program." "We're not doing a rush job," added Huntley.

Committee member John Metson indicated that some progress is being made toward the recommendations. Metson, a teacher in the Community Living Program, said he hoped the committee would come up with a very real examination of the program's courses and "realize the necessity of having this kind of thematic program at the U of T."

But according to Davis, there is a distinct possibility that the formation of this committee could spell the end of the community living program in its present format.

Davis insists that dissolution of the program, lack of renewal of present community-based staff contracts, or amalgamation with another faculty, are all very real possibilities.

Infirmary's future dubious

By STEPHEN ELLAMS

The writing on the wall at the U of T Infirmary reads "Don't panic, it's not a fait accompli yet." The note expresses the staff's attitude towards the strong possibility of the Infirmary's closing at the end of the 1978-79 academic year according to the recommendation of the Governing Council's Health Service Working Group.

Located at 42 St. George Street, the Infirmary specializes in consultation and convalescent care, the kind of services students will find almost impossible to obtain from hospital emergency departments according to Head Nurse Patricia Mabey.

Mabey also pointed out that 72 exams were written at the Infirmary last year by students who were physically unable to go to the examination halls. She noted that in these cases, the exams would have been forfeit if there had been no Infirmary.

She also cited the case of student Peter Rowe, who because of the large cast on his injured knee ligaments finds it impossible to commute from his Don Mills home. At the Infirmary he receives convalescent care and is sufficiently close to the main campus buildings to continue his studies.

Mabey spoke out against the alternative of boarding Infirmary patients in college residences. She argued that extra expense would be incurred for the requisite staff to care for the patients and for the equipment needed for contagious diseases. She noted that of the 199 patients admitted to the infirmary last year, 88 didn't live in residence.

"In the final analysis," said Mabey, "salaries are behind it all." She added, however, that "none of us here are overpaid." She stated that non-academic services are "always vulnerable" in a time of budgetary restraint.

Mabey suggested placing Health Services, the infirmary and Psychiatric Services under one roof, preferably the Infirmary's, as a cost-cutting device. She stated that a "deal" could be made for office space with the Infirmary's being housed on the second floor of the building.

The Health Services Working Group's recommendation will be resolved on November 15 at the Internal Affairs Committee meeting.

Ah, U of T lets off a little steam

By PHIL LIBMAN
Reporter on the scene

Contrary to the high hopes of many U of T students, the noise and rush of steam heard and seen from the vicinity of the MacLennan Physical Laboratories was not U of T threatening to blow-up.

"Part of the boiler system was shut down, and it was a release valve letting off the pressure that built up," said U of T police sergeant R. Christianson.

"It is a high-pressure valve in the boiler room plant that releases steam," Christianson explained.

This is not something that should necessarily happen because three fire engines and several police cars woke up sleeping dormitory residents as they sped to the scene.

"Maybe it is just an Irishman letting off steam," said one passer-by.

Varsity en francais

Today The Varsity begins publishing articles in French.

On page 11, the column "Perspectives" makes its debut. It will contain news and reviews of a francophone nature written in French.

The column will appear on an occasional basis throughout the year.

Innis community living program may soon be in the dark. It is presently under review.

Correction

The statement in the article on the Academic Affairs Committee meeting in Monday's issue "Either foreign students pay their increased fees, or all students receive less in terms of lab materials and tutors," was incorrectly attributed by The Varsity to Professor Tom Langan. It should have been attributed to Dean Bernard Elkin.

PROFE$$ORS DOING WELL

Over the last couple of years all of us have been feeling the effects of government cutbacks at U of T. Or is it only some of us? Of all the different groups that comprise Canada's largest post-secondary institution, students, technical staff and administration, one group has escaped the ravages of restraint without ever having attacked the effects of government cutbacks on the rest of us.

We're talking about U of T's academic staff.

Faculty at U of T, aside from "suffering" the hardship of larger classes, have been looking after themselves very nicely.

While library systems have seen their share of the budget drop from 11 per cent to 7½ per cent over the last several years, a decrease of one third, while library workers were held to an AIB imposed salary of 6.2 per cent last year, professors enjoyed a 9.4 per cent increase.

The profs. found the AIB guidelines, not to mention the administration, far more obliging than the library workers ever did. The profs. got around the AIB guidelines through a performance-based "merit" increase of up to 5 per cent.

So while the rest of us have been suffering under inflation (which last year was 8.4 per cent, meaning library workers who average $8,500 a year actually lost more than they gained), professors, the average of whom make between $23,000 and $26,000 a year enjoyed a larger-than-inflation increase. It is worth noting that the salaries of 3,500 lecturers and professors take up 47 per cent of U of T's budget while 5,000 support and administrative staff together account for only 32 per cent of the budget.

One wonders where professors' voices were last year when tuition fees jumped up 17 per cent or when the new OSAP program this year is threatening to reduce still further accessibility to university. We're also in the dark about what professors feel about the 20.9 per cent decrease in the number of foreign students able to afford Ontario universities this year.

It will be said that if professors' salaries are allowed to deteriorate, professors will start going elsewhere. Canadian professors, however, earn more than their American counterparts and U of T professors are already the best paid in Ontario. There is little in the way of incentive to leave U of T.

The recently released Interim Report from the Planning and Priorities Sub-committee (which had three professors out of the six people who wrote it) put its finger on the problem: either there is more "flexibility in tenure or else there is a decrease of "flexibility in program choice by students either by decreasing options or increasing structure." (pp 19-20).

The university has not officially decided which of the two alternatives it will opt for, but the report gives us a hint when it says, at the end of the same paragraph, that "the proposed Erindale curriculum ("New New program") at Erindale College is a move in this direction (decreasing the options available to students)."

Will students, on top of fewer library hours, larger tutorial classes, larger classrooms in general, and decreasing accessibility, also lose the changes in program gained in the late 60's and early 70's, to the demands of professors?

This whole argument leads us to the conclusion that not only are cutbacks a threat to student's education but also that professors' demands have been met at the expense of those less able to defend themselves: students and support staff.

Either all segments of the university shoulder the cutbacks equally or else they all fight them together. To have faculty staff look after themselves while others are left on the wayside is unacceptable. It will only serve as justification of the cutbacks.

Letters & Opinions

UT press cover-up

U of T's Press acting director, Harald Bohne in his letter of Oct. 28 evaded the points brought up in my article of Oct. 21.

Mr. Bohne writes, "(the article) gives the erroneous impression that the Press not only edits the publications which appear under its imprint but also its financial statements." Well according to the Audit and Finance Subcommittee report number 38 which was part of the Business Affairs Committee agenda, U of T press does edit its financial statement. As Prof. Coutts, the committee's vice-chairman said, "there is only one figure for the Press, instead of detailed figures on the three divisions of publication, printing and bookstores."

Mr. Bohne in his letter left out the fact that there are no detailed financial statements made available to Governing Council about the printing and publication divisions. The discussion at the meeting revolved around that fact, as can be shown from the committee's vote to table the U of T Press financial statement.

One then wonders how accurate Mr. Bohne is when he says that "the Press is fully accountable to the University administration, its auditors, and the Governing Council." If that were so, why the justifiable concern over its financial statement?

Also, Mr. Bohne spends a very long paragraph, repeating what is in paragraph four of the story, namely, that the Press charges the bookstore $80,000 in interest.

If the Press, has, as Mr. Bohne said, "nothing to hide", then it would publish detailed financial statements open to the governing council on its three separate divisions. I trust that this will be discussed by the Business Affairs Committee. Then we will see if U of T Press has "nothing to hide."

Double negatives

Your letters column last Friday (Oct. 28) carried a fine example of how liberal arts students cope with the difficulties of logic involved in a double negative.

After asserting that a former English professor of theirs who has been relieved of his position is "informative, provocative, witty," and "a superlative educator," the four co-signatories (one of them a Varsity staffer) thump the conclusion home with the classic, "Though the situation may be irreversible, our conviction is not."

These are fickle times. I only hope that the professor in question won't be subjected to harassment when opinions swing to the other extreme.

Kate Millett denigrates women

Kate Millett's address suffered from the "schizophrenia" which she attributed to the rest of society. She was to speak in behalf of women but in fact spoke against them. If she is a "leader" of the women's movement, it is indeed in crisis. Her remarks betrayed an amazing condescension and mocking attitude towards women who do not share her views. The speech can accurately be described as a lament that there are women in this world who do not agree with her and who are willing to exercise their rights of freedom of speech and assembly to oppose her. She employed shallow and empty rhetoric in including in the same category the Klu Klux Klan, the John Birch Society, Right to Life, Mormons, Lutherans, Catholics, and Baptists — all labelled as Nazis and fascists. Strange bed-fellows if ever there were.

Her generalizing invective did not stop, though, with titled groups. She expressed contempt and scorn for the "housewives, dime store clerks, students, and women on welfare" who came to the International Woman's Year conferences in the U.S. (The conferences were fostered to serve the women's movement by Bella Abzug who managed to have the U.S. government allot $5 million for such gatherings.) What bothered Millett was that women other than radical feminists came. She was most perturbed that the majority of these "reactionary", "right-wing", "religious" women had never participated in a "consciousness-raising cell". She referred to her opposition as "poor, rural, politically naive, illiterate, older, housewives" who were "robots" under the control of men. Clearly, Millett does not grant any independence of mind to women in these categories.

Yet in spite of the "poverty and inexperience" of the "right-wing" women, they staged a well-financed and sophisticated opposition. Millett insisted, but offered no proof, that they were managed by men. Is Millett suggesting that only men are capable of such organizational prowess; that lower class women could not mobilize themselves; that no intelligent women subscribe to any position but her own? It might serve Millett well if she were to learn more about the "other side". For instance, it may interest Millett to know that the president of the Right to Life organization in the U.S. is a woman, the first black woman to have graduated from Harvard Medical School.

She reported that in spite of their numbers, their organization, and "slick tactics", the "right-wing" contingent elected from their number only 10-25 percent of the delegation attending the final Women's Year meeting in Houston. We might wonder why the successes of such a sophisticated campaign were so few. We might suspect, as indeed the news reports from Colorado, Minnesota, and New York indicated, that these meetings were planned and conducted in such a fashion as to prevent the introduction of opposing views and candidates.

Near the close of her speech, though, Millett did soften her attitude towards her opposition. She urged her audience to remember the "humanity" of the opposition. She informed her audience that these women are "real persons", "fellow-citizens", and that some of the audience may even have cousins among them. Her advice was for the women's movement to "turn the world into a vast grade school", and educate these women.

Millett did not confine her name-calling to women. She referred to the U.S. congressmen who used to vote automatically for the radical feminist line as "nit-wits" and "bumpkins" because they are now, in her view, terrified of the "right-wing". (Evidently, no one but radical feminists are capable of thinking for themselves.) So her analysis of this new involvement of grass-roots (as she admitted) women in women's caucuses is that they are women manipulated by "cowardly men" and formed by them into an army to terrify

Once we discard the rhetoric and examine what substance there was in her speech, we find that the family was the real source of conflict between "right-wing" women and radical-feminists. Millett provoked the largest laugh from her audience when she described "right-wing" women with banners promoting "God, Country, and Motherhood". Millett recognized that the women who went to the IWY meetings went because out of fear that the nuclear family is under threat of extinction. Millett did not dispell her audience's fear of this. Rather she gave the impression, especially through her constant advocacy of anarchy and her portrayal of supporters of the family as opponents of gay rights, that she thought the dissolution of the family to be a good thing. At any rate she was totally unsympathetic to those concerned about the survival of the family. Her only concerns were abortion, day care, the Equal Rights Amendment (ERA), and equal pay. She lumped them together as if they were a package deal and offered no rational argument in support of any of them. Moreover, though most women, no matter which position they take, are under the impression that such are the "real issues" of the women's movement, she claimed that the "roots of our oppressions are that we get beaten up and raped." Now surely even the "right-wing" women would not be supporters of such oppression, nor would any decent man. How can this be an issue when no one is in favor of it?

Millett in no way explored what might be the proper relation between men and women but for the most part portrayed men as promoters of physical domination, enslavers, manipulators, and cowardly bumpkins. I suggest that for the majority of women and men the questions of the nature of their relationship with one another and the roles they are to take in family life are of great importance. While the topics of men and of the family were not included under the title of her speech, they were the implied object of most of her remarks. Many have long suspected that the women's movement was anti-family and anti-men. Her insinuations against men and the family give support to that suspicion. Is it also anti-women? Her unrestrained denigration of women who oppose her reveals a woman's movement which has no room for women who are not radical-feminists.

Review headline called racist

A headline on page 11 of the Varsity (28 October 1977) read "Toronto's top wop drops pop". The article went on to discuss the singer Domenico Troiano. On that same day over two hundred members of the American Italian Historical Association and the Canadian Italian Historical Association were meeting on our campus. They were engaged in a scholarly conference on Italian immigrant women, however several participants spoke out from the podium during the sessions to express their shock that a University newspaper would print an ethnic slur.

The young lady who wrote the article, the Varsity editors who accepted the banner line for publication, and the University should apologize to those conference delegates and to all Italian North Americans for printing an ugly ethnic epithet and perpetuating prejudice. We accept your apology in advance and assume that the presence of so many people of Italian descent in the country will, in time, make Canada more "civile e gentile".

Prof. R.F. Harney, Pres. CIHA
Prof. L. Iorizzo, Pres. AIHA

Ed.'s note: The author of the review on Domenico Troiano was not responsible for the headline; the Review editor was. The Varsity offers its sincere apologies to the Italian community. Steps will be taken to ensure that in future racist remarks will not find their way into the paper.

Existentialism and terrorism

As if to confirm my suspicion that many of those who have so far attacked my views on terrorism have not read what I wrote, Richard Taylor accused me last Friday of a position I do not hold.

Taylor accuses me of holding the view that acts of terrorism are themselves neither justified nor unjustified (neither right nor wrong) but rather await the verdict of history.

This is false on two counts. To hold that human actions can only be judged in a historical context by no means implies that such actions are neither right or wrong. It merely suggests that a moral judgement cannot always be made at a moment's notice and that it is even harder to make a judgement prior to an action.

More important still, I never said that an act has to be judged exclusively on the basis of its historical ramifications. "The choice is between doing nothing, which means opting for oppression, or breaking the contradiction through an act that at best can only be justified historically." The end demands means of achieving it but the means define the end." That is what I said. Clearly there is a moral dilemma here, one which Taylor ignores completely.

Unless reason can tell us that an action is good or bad prior to it being undertaken, writes Taylor, there is no basis for "truth". The example he uses to illustrate his argument is the murder of Jews and Christians (not to mention communists, socialists and others) by the Nazis. Unfortunately Taylor is fooled by his own example.

To condemn Nazi atrocities is easy. It requires little thought as to the basis of one's moral revulsion. The example in fact is the worst possible since it gives credence to an instinctive brand of morality, a morality which like that of the Nazis whom Taylor condemns is based on one's personal emotions and little else. Still even this example does not support Taylor's contention that historical judgements are inadequate. If the Nazi atrocities seem immoral despite their historical context it is because even before they ever took place it could be foreseen that they would never contribute to human happiness. One did not have to wait for history's judgement because one could foresee it.

The problem exists in those cases where one has to balance bad means against a good end. "All means are bad," says the hero in Simone de Beauvoir's The Blood of Others. He knows that if his resistance cell derailed German troop trains the Nazis will retaliate against innocent civilians. Contemplation merely makes him aware of the terrible choice he has to make. He knows that his actions may prove ineffectual, in which case their sole effect will be the death of innocent people. If he does nothing however he will be accepting and making easier the German occupation. He decides to blow up trains. Whether his decision is right or wrong will at best be known to him only at the end of the war and even then he may continue to dispute it with himself.

"Murder, be it on behalf of oppressed masses or for the sake of the wealthy few, is wrong," says Taylor. Perhaps. But sometimes pacifism entails the murder of others. It is Taylor who is equivocating here. Not to take sides is to take the side of the stronger agent which in this case means capitalism and the liberal state.

One thing that should be made clear is that "terrorism" comprises a variety of actions. The recent hijacking of a Lufthansa jet and the murder of its pilot is terrorism. So was the execution of Hans Martin Schleyer. The first is an instance of random terror that no genuine revolutionary could condone. The second is terror directed at a specific, high-ranking agent of capitalism. While one may condemn the killing of Schleyer on the grounds that it will only serve as an excuse for the German government to step-up repression one cannot condemn it on moral grounds. At best one can say that capitalists are socially conditioned to be criminals, that being the victims of their own system they should be rehabilitated rather than shot. That's the most that one can say for them.

That it is impossible to judge human actions without reference to their historical significance is itself a historical judgement. It is an indication that we live in what Marx called "prehistory": a world within which individuals make history in ignorance of the actions of others. Their collective actions consequently appear as an alien force over which they have no control. The irrationality which this condition introduces into human events prevents the application of reason to human actions to the degree that the significance of such events becomes apparent only after a period of time. It is the aim of revolutionaries to end this condition and make it possible for human beings to make history in solidarity with each other. At that point reason can be called upon to rule over human affairs. History will have lost its oppressive character.

The second contest is now underway. If you have any pictures of students, about students, about things that students do and so forth, submit an 8x10 inch black and white copy of it to the contest. Who knows, you might win an album or sports tickets and of course, some constructive criticism from the Varsity photo department. Bring or mail your entries to the Varsity, 91 St. George, 2nd floor by 1 p.m. Thursday and you will be entered. All entries that we receive up to and including December 1st will be automatically entered in a Grand Final. Keep on clickin'.

TALK TO AN M.P.P.

November 10th is your opportunity to voice your concerns, in consort with people from all across Ontario, directly to the members of the legislature.

Lobby Day, co-ordinated by OFS and SAC, is a day when students and people involved with post-secondary education can come together to meet with their M.P.P.

Started last year, Lobby Day proved to be most successful in helping to get the student point of view across to Cabinet Members and other law makers.

The President of the Students' Administrative Council, John Tuzyk, will be leading folks over to Queen's Park after gathering that morning. Get in touch with John before November 10th or come in and let us know your name, address and (if you know) the name of the Member of Parliament from your area.

Lobbying will be going on all day. Obviously Student Aid will be a top priority to be discussed, as well as government summer job programmes and the employment picture in general.

Find out how your M.P.P. feels about university and college students — directly — on Lobby Day, next Thursday.

MAJOR BLOOD DRIVE

The SAC sponsored Canadian Red Cross Blood Donor Clinic continues for the rest of this week at the Medical Sciences Building. Today and Friday the Clinic will be open from 10 in the morning until 4 in the afternoon. Thursday the Clinic will remain open from 10 until 6:30.

In a recent letter to Dr. Evans, SAC challenged the administration of the U of T to match blood donor donations. "There is some rumour that administration officers of the University are basically a bloodless lot," the letter stated, "and we would therefore hope that the respective officers would take advantage of this occasion to disprove this heinous rumour."

Bring someone along with you when you come to the Blood Donor Clinic at the Medical Sciences Building being held the rest of this week. Don't be afraid. It doesn't hurt a bit.

IDEAS TO LISTEN TO

Is anyone interested in Radio Varsity?

SAC's Radio Varsity closed its doors in the spring of 1976. Should they be re-opened? Are you a D.J., radio production person, copywriter or an ad-salesman? Are you a person who would be willing to do some intensive study into the problems involved in getting Radio Varsity going once again?

Based on the assumption that there are some people who care about having a St. George Campus-based radio station, SAC will be holding a Radio Varsity Open House, tomorrow — Thursday, November 3rd — from 4:00 p.m. until 8:00 p.m. at the SAC Media Building, 91 St. George Street. The Radio Varsity offices are on the third floor. Come on up. Now's the time to share your views and the free refreshments.

Students Love To Fly

Approximately one-quarter of the Association of Student Councils' total business is done with the students at the University of Toronto. AOSC's subsidiary company, the Canadian Universities Travel Service, can handle all of your travel needs at reasonable prices. Located at 44 St. George Street, AOSC-CUTS is open from Monday to Friday, 9 until 5. The phone number there is 979-2604.

SAC, along with sixty other student councils throughout Canada, is a part owner of AOSC. A member of SAC's Executive is also one of the six elected Board of Directors of the company.

In addition to providing anything and everything that a normal travel service or airline provides, CUTS has specific travel programmes that take student budgets into consideration. SAC members have used CUTS when having to get to conferences or when making any of a dozen different travel arrangements. CUTS' services are available by simply walking in the door. Programmes and flights are offered at prices which are the lowest permitted by government regulations.

AOSC-CUTS Staff Is Ready To Help You On Your Way.

CUTS' primary reason for existing is to provide service to students. It is an organization that has you in mind. Extending student buying power is one of the main tenets of AOSC-CUTS as well as offering special student related travel packages such as language course travel and educational tours of such places as Cuba, the USSR and Czechoslovakia. CUTS also acts as the Canadian student travel voice to visitors throughout the world: arranging tours and showing off a cross section of Canadian life.

With offices in Toronto, Ottawa, Vancouver and Halifax, CUTS is your specialist in student travel. Let them help you when you're on the move.

DAVE ESSIG AT INNIS

The SAC Taddle Creek Folk Series continues to cause pleasure across the three campuses of the University of Toronto. Tomorrow, Thursday, November 3rd, Dave Essig will pay a visit to the people out at Scarborough in the Meeting Place at 12 noon. The afternoon of harmonious vibrating will, as always, be free of charge. Thursday night Dave can be heard for only one dollar at Innis Town Hall starting at 7:00 p.m. Ramble on over to SAC today for those few remaining seats.

Colleges and faculties compete at blood clinic

By SA'ADA SAIDULLAH

Don't let the pumpkins at the door and the banners festooning University College and the Medical Sciences Building asking you to GIVE BLOOD TODAY fool you. It all started on Halloween Monday — not the International Vampire Association annual convention in Toronto — but the Canadian Red Cross Society week-long blood donor clinic at U of T.

The Red Cross has two clinics at U of T every year. The one this week is the first. Those who miss it will have to wait until March of next year. It is hoped that 2,000 units of blood will be collected by Friday, November 4.

Colleges and faculties are competing with each other to donate the most blood. The engineers are lagging badly behind the Meds (score 62-40). The Phys. Ed. are being soundly drubbed by the Nurses (score 18-7). In the colleges, UC is way ahead with its contribution of 25 units. St. Mikes has given 20, Vic 16 and Trinity has donated 13 units. Pharmacy with 24 is way ahead of Forestry with its seedling contribution of 3 units. Staff members have donated 23 units.

The administration is at the bottom with 1 unit.

Red Cross representatives also said that as of 12:30 p.m. yesterday a total of 347 units had been collected. The 12-bed clinic is open from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. Friday, Thursday, the clinic in the Med Sci lounge will be open till 6:30 p.m.

Nancy Hall, head nurse at the clinic, is glad that people have been steadily coming in. "There are no problems," said Hall. The number of students pouring in to give blood certainly seem to agree. Donors were enjoying the free orange juice and biscuits being passed around once they had risen from the beds.

Beverly Davis (Food Sciences IV), a donor, felt "it is a civic responsibility." She said "it is not at all painful. The worst part is the hypodermic prick." Bill McKelvi (Meds I) who has given blood "quite a few times," said "It's no worse than getting a needle. The technicians and volunteers are very friendly."

Guyana's ex-PM calls for new national front

By FRED WEIR

Cheddi Jagan, leader of the People's Progressive Party (PPP) of Guyana, explained his call for a "National Patriotic Front" in his country to a packed house at Central Technical High School last Friday.

Jagan, who was the first prime minister of Guyana after its independence from Britain in 1964, stated that "Guyana today is no longer a free country." Freedom of speech, he said, and freedom of the press are being suppressed by the People's National Congress government of Prime Minister Forbes Burnham. "The government is accelerating the stifling of all critical opinion, and the news media, with a few honorable exceptions, are approaching the point of complete abdication of its responsibilities."

In his speech, Jagan cited several specific instances of repression, which he said has reached its height in the current strike of sugar workers against the state-controlled sugar industry. These include the use of military forces and government employees as strike-breakers, the arrest of more than 100 strikers by the police, the denial of peaceful picketing, and the hiring of 6,132 "scabs" to permanently take the places of the striking workers.

In relation to these events, the news media in Guyana report only the news they feel is "favorable to the government; in short, it is managed news," Jagan charged. In addition, the restrictions on the right to strike and the right of assembly mean that Guyana is rapidly moving towards an authoritarian, semi-military state, he said.

To counter this process, the PPP proposes the formation of a "National Patriotic Front", which Jagan described briefly as a governmental framework in which "the winner does not take all." According to Jagan, a National Front government would have a president and a prime minister, each drawn from one of the two major political parties. Free and fair elections would be ensured; the proxy and "overseas" voting which have enabled elections to be rigged in the past would be abolished. A new constitution would guarantee democratic rights and decentralize power, he explained.

Pointing to Washington, Jagan suggested that the machinations of "outside powers and economic interests" were behind the current wave of repressions in Guyana. His proposals to thwart these interests include nationalization of key industries in the Guyanese economy, and the strengthening of relations with the common market (COMECOM) countries of Eastern Europe.

Jagan insisted that his proposals form "a solution to the political impasse which has bedevilled Guyana for more than two decades." He said they are fair and reasonable, and that he is confident "all patriotic Guyanese will realize that it offers a way out of the present crisis."

Doors open for blood

note.

Rock radio station Q107 was on hand to keep track of the college and faculty donations and the handful of spectators joined with Red Cross officials to open the clinic doors properly.

Report from China

By David Brown

David Brown graduated from Trinity College in Political Economy in 1976. Last year he attended Peking Language Institute, where he continued his studies of the Chinese language, begun in his last two years at U of T.

Brown is now studying ancient Chinese History at Nanking University, in southern China. In this first of a series of articles dispatched from Nanking, Brown describes the daily life of foreign students in China as viewed from the perspective of the Peking Language Institute.

In his next article, Brown will describe his altogether different experience at Nanking.

NANKING

Armed with an ample supply of coffee and as many books as could be carried, I headed back into China after a short summer holiday in Hong Kong. Coming back for a second year of study, I could not help but wonder precisely what was drawing me back. I had spent the last year at the Peking Language Institute studying Chinese, and was looking forward to a new year at Nanking University. Such enthusiasm was, I reluctantly realized, fragile and temporary, soon to be put in its proper place when I once again stepped into the role of that peculiar creature the Chinese call the "foreign exchange student."

Over 60 countries send students to China for various study purposes. Most Third World students study applied sciences and medicine, whereas Western students read in a limited number of the arts and humanities. Fudan University in Shanghai offers courses in classical and modern Chinese literature, Liaoning University in Shenyang advanced Chinese language, and Nanking University ancient and modern Chinese history. Peking University remains the centre for foreign students, offering philosophy, history and literature. During the past year however, Peking has started to phase out the one year short-term courses, admitting students only to the three-year course. Third World students study at a variety of schools — Peking's Qinghua University, Zhongshan University in Canton, plus technical and medical colleges throughout the country. Irrespective of their field of study, all foreign students share the common heritage of having spent some time at the Peking Language Institute.

Situated in the northwestern suburbs of Peking, a pleasant forty minute bike ride from the centre of the city, the Institute is surrounded by other academic institutions and the farm land of a suburban commune. Just north of the school runs the road to the Ming Tombs, the flat Peking plain making for an easy day's ride there and back. Closer to the school are the ruins of the old Summer Palace, sacked by the British and French in 1860, and further west the new Summer Palace built during the final decades of the Qing Dynasty.

Currently the Peking Language Institute contains about 800 students: 500 foreign and 300 Chinese. The foreign majority gives the place a distinctly non-Chinese air, in fact making it a foreign ghetto similar to the diplomatic communities of Peking. A non-Chinese institute in a Chinese surrounding, the school is designed to serve foreign students. Physical facilities are superior to those at other senior schools in Peking: two, rather than six people to a room, showers in every dormitory, hot water six days a week (5:00 p.m.-8:00 p.m.), water boilers in each building (all drinking water in China is boiled and dispensed while hot), a special cafeteria for foreign students, a small specialty store, and recently upgraded sports facilities. In spite of being in China, one really is not.

Daily Life

The day begins at 6:00 a.m. for most Chinese students, who do some physical exercise, perhaps review their language lessons, and then head off for breakfast. It remains for the 7:00 a.m. broadcast of "The East is Red" to jolt most foreign students out of bed. Classes start at 8:00 a.m. and run through to noon. Mid-way through the morning there is a 20 minute break during which students do the "Broadcast Exercises" (calisthenics to the accompaniment of martial music) and, for the more aesthetically minded, Tai-Chi Chuan. After lunch comes the ubiquitous Chinese xiuxi, or rest period. Often the school arranged visits during the afternoon, but normally the time remained free. Films were shown outdoors at night, and students, teachers and children would carry their chairs to the main field where a large screen had been set up.

A foreign student does not go unequipped to meet the demands of this routine. Upon arrival each student receives a survival kit from the Institute. To meet the rigors of the elements, students get a blanket, mosquito-net, and beidz — a thick, down-stuffed quilt which acts like a furnace in winter. Only one's imagination limits the uses of the porcelain basin — laundry-tub, washing bowl, humidifier, tea tray, etc. Hot drinking water is kept in Suibings (thermos), probably the most widespread consumer good in China. When we arrived in late August, 1976, workers were repairing the main water boilers damaged during the earthquake, and a makeshift coal-stoked boiler was set up outside. Teachers would rotate stoking duties, and this antique rapidly became the social centre of the school. Romanticism, however, soon gave way to impersonal taps once the residence boilers had been repaired.

Aside from the boilers, the major quake in July inflicted little damage on the school. But in November a strong aftershock hit the city, causing frantic school officials to move all foreign students into tents. (Chinese students slept in either the ping-pong hall or the empty swimming pool under a tarp.) Late in the evening a convoy of army trucks rolled into the school and deposited their load of tents, which students struggled to put up in the dark, sleep finally coming at 2:00 a.m. A mini-United Nations soon took shape in this makeshift community, with flags hoisted and multi-colored sketches chalked on the tents. Classes were held on beds jammed into the tents, with a resultant plunge in attention spans. The novelty of sleeping in sub-zero weather soon wore off, and over officials' protests students moved back to the treacherous, but warmer comfort of their rooms.

Although the Institute provides a special cafeteria for foreign students, many eat with the Chinese. Breakfast normally consists of steamed bread rolls stuffed with jam, and a corn gruel. Lunch and dinner offered a choice of three or four dishes, ranging in price from 5 to 15 cents, the more expensive containing slices of meat and fresh vegetables. During the spring and summer, peas, beans, potatoes, cucumbers, lettuce and tomatoes are alternatively available. As the winter wears on baicai, the local cabbage, becomes the staple in every dish (Early in autumn the streets of Peking are stacked with cabbages which people store in underground holes for use during the winter.)

To supplement the low meat content of the dishes, cold meat and dried vegetables are sold separately. Grain remains the staple food of the Chinese diet, students consuming 4 or 5 liang of rice each meal, or the equivalent in steamed bread. Although rationed, Chinese students receive a substantial 25 to 30 jin of grain per month. More voracious students rely on the lesser appetites of their classmates, who sell their unused ration coupons.

Incomes vary widely among students. Chinese students receive living stipends ranging from $9 to $15 per month, from their former work units or the government. The government assumes tuition costs, and issues some supplementary grain and cloth tickets. Families provide some extra money for daily needs. As the vast majority of foreign students are in China on scholarships, they receive stipends, from the Chinese government. These range from $60 per month for undergraduate students (mostly Third World countries) to $70 per month for graduate students. Tuition costs and board are also assumed by the Chinese. Some governments pay their students supplementary stipends. Canadian students receive an additional $100 per month, slightly higher than the average for other Western countries. Third World students do not fare as well since few of their governments supplement the Chinese stipend.

Red vs. Expert

During the last half of the school year we lived with Chinese roommates, who varied them, but their classmates informally grouped together to help them along. A generation gap also existed. Younger students felt academically inferior to the older, professional students who had been trained before the Cultural Revolution. For several years their classes had been stopped, and when they graduated a minimum two years lay ahead. They therefore felt they had a lot of catching up to do. Bringing this "missed generation" back into the mainstream of society stands as one of the pressing social problems of the day in China.

In spite of the past century and a half of social revolution in China, a common thread ties together Chinese administrators of the past and present:

"The avoidance of issues became a fine art. The bureaucracy learned to harmonize the elements of the local scene, not how to change them. Officials waited for things to happen, hoping they would not. They devised stratagems with which to meet all eventualities. They took negative measures to achieve objects. They were constantly on their guard and particularly alarmed at innovators and newcomers."

considerably in background. My roommate was in his 30's, a native of Shandong currently teaching physical chemistry at Dalian University. His university had sent him to study English for a year, after which they wanted him, much against his will, to teach English to chemistry students. Instead he would have preferred to use English in his research work, and when he graduated the matter still had not been resolved. Many students were like him, professionals who had had their careers interrupted to learn a foreign language. Although most returned to their units after graduation, others were sent overseas for technical studies. In fact one member of that class is currently studying at U of T.

The younger students were part of a three-year language program designed to train interpreters for government agencies. After secondary school, all had gone to either the countryside or a factory for two or three years of labor. Only two of the first-year class were of peasant background. Since the rest had been educated in the city, distinct differences in educational levels existed. These two students struggled throughout the year to match the progress of the others. No special classes were arranged for

Open-Door Schooling

Our experience with open-door schooling illustrates the tension between the rich potential of our programs, and the smothering way in which they are administered. Open-door schooling was introduced during the Cultural Revolution to familiarize Chinese students with life and work in factories and the countryside. Applied to foreign students it combined a leisurely mix of labor and lectures at factories and communes. Last April our class spent a week at the Peking Heavy Generator Factory, sleeping in the workers' dormitories and eating in their cafeteria. Living at the factory made the difference between success and failure, for it enabled us to observe and participate in the daily routine of the workers: the early morning walk to the cafeteria, noontime basketball games, poker games during work breaks, washing up at the public bathing houses after work. One evening we followed the sound of a radio down to a room where young workers were listening to the broadcast of Beethoven's Fifth, another time we played pickup games of ping-pong in the recreation centre. By living at the factory we broke down to some extent the official limits surrounding the program.

Educational standards vary widely from the countryside to the city, causing problems in the universities.

Our week in June at a commune contrasted sharply with the time at the factory. We commuted daily to the commune by special bus, ate in a special room, and our contact with the peasants was deliberately limited. Some students who were invited into a peasant's home were later reprimanded for not "respecting" the privacy of the peasants.

Herein lies a basic tension in the position of the foreign student. We get many opportunities not afforded to other foreigners to view daily life in China. While promising in form, bureaucrats place so many obstacles between the people and the students that it takes major efforts, often unsuccessful, to achieve the intent of the program — gaining a better understanding of life in China. Such efforts inevitably create conflict with officials who wish to present life in China as they consider it should be seen. This fundamental difference in view between students and cadres characterises all activities for the foreign student.

Personal contact not easy

All protestations of international friendship and understanding aside, Chinese officials attempt to minimize contact between foreigners and Chinese. At the Institute our roommates could not accept invitations to go out for a meal. When the U of T Hockey Blues played several exhibition games in Peking last year, Chinese students had to decline our offers to go to the games. My roommate at Nanking University, a soldier, cannot go outside the school with me since military personnel are not permitted to have unofficial contact with foreigners. If you were to meet by chance on the street, the rules of the game sometimes change, but in general personal contact with foreigners is not considered socially acceptable behavior. Overly friendly behavior with a foreigner often results in social criticism or a reprimand by the police. People are therefore reluctant to enter into conversations, let alone invite you into their homes.

The current prohibition of private student travel in China presents another side of the problem. Prior to the summer of 1976 students could travel relatively freely on their own to areas open to foreigners. Last fall the Ministry of Education banned all such travel, allowing students to travel only on trips arranged by the schools during the winter and summer holidays. On these trips some teachers understood and sympathized with our desire to get a more rounded picture of Chinese life, and worked to help us out. During our summer trip a cadre's general bending on the rules permitted us to visit Taiyuan, site of the magnificent Jinci temple, and only a flash flood prevented us from visiting an operating Buddhist monastery south of the temple. On the other hand, when city officials in Sian discovered students were attending services at the Muslim mosque, a "No Visitors Allowed" sign was hurriedly put up.

When the Chinese analyse their relations with other countries they use the concept of distinguishing between the people and the government of a country. Relationships between the peoples of the world are basically harmonious, and only the interference of governments disrupts this underlying friendship. Such may be equally said of China. One must escape the heavy hand of officials to discover the reality of China. In Peking, the large size of the foreign community makes such escape extremely difficult. Nanking on the other hand, only recently opened to foreign students, provides many more opportunities, and it is to Nanking we next turn.

Ed note: Brown's next article was dispatched from Nanking recently and will appear in a future issue.

Brown found several young factory workers gathered in a room to listen to a broadcast of Beethoven.

The York Pioneer salutes 150-year of U of T

Garlands are being thrown in all directions during this Sesquicentennial year, and one of them recently arrived at The Varsity offices.

An organization known as the York Pioneer and Historical Society publishes a yearly magazine The York Pioneer. The latest issue includes among the book reviews and historical articles, a "Sesquicentennial Salute to the University of Toronto."

Conceding that it is difficult to make an appropriate tribute "which is more than a ceremonial gesture when volumes would be required to tell the story," the editor in his preface enters upon glowing accolades which continue for the next 27 pages of the salute.

The plaudits begin with an excerpt from Toronto of Old by Henry Scadding, a Toronto author and historian and the sixth president of the York Pioneer and Historical Society from 1880-1898.

Scadding recalls the founding of the University of King's College, the forerunner of U of T. He describes seeing, as a boy, men "actually at work with axes and mattocks; yokes of oxen, too, were straining at strong ploughs" on the site.

In another U of T tradition, however, Scadding relates that the commencement procession "such as had never before been seen in these parts," proved to be premature. The building under construction was never completed, and in 1856, "its fortune was to be converted into a Female Department for the overcrowded Provincial Lunatic Asylum."

U of T finally came to life, Scadding wrote, and became "a kind of Salamanca for the country at large; a place of resort for students from all parts."

A brief history of each of the colleges and of the key buildings comprising the campus follows; the editor also explores the "family traditions and links" that are at the heart of the university. The U of T graduates who have given the university its prestige and place in Canada's history are listed too.

The salute also undertakes "a brief excursion" to list some of the scientific achievements of U of T: included among the discoveries of disease analysis equipment, a plastic that "rots" in sunlight, and cyclopropane, is the information that from the university came the balanced food for babies — Pabulum.

Arch. argue at Innis

By MICHAEL SCHABAS

The meaning of public buildings in a rapidly changing world came under consideration in the architecture forum at Innis Town Hall last Thursday evening. The colloquy was one in a series sponsored by the Architecture Alumni Association to discuss recently completed renovations of four Toronto east-end libraries.

The four architects responsible for the renovations presented their work. The lack of agreement among them as to the significance of public institutions and the subsequent discussion demonstrated the lack of established architectural principles in this realm.

James Lorimer, urban economist and Toronto Public Library Board member, began by describing how citizens' objections stopped construction of a $2,000,000 Eastern District Library. Instead, the money was allocated to renovate five run down east-end libraries, he said.

Lorimer read statistics giving evidence of long standing library board preference for the affluent north end. The recently completed Northern District Library cost $6,000,000 for an area population of about 100,000. He pointed out that the Eastern District Library, budgeted at $2,000,000 and the Western District, at $1,200,000 for respective populations of 150,000 and 250,000, would appear to be somewhat shortchanged. This is apparently the result of a board policy to provide a standard type of service according to the level of demand, Lorimer said.

Architect Bruce Kuwabara showed slides of a "tuned up" Jones Avenue Branch. New shelving, furniture, a skylight and entrance canopy where installed into the 15 year old building at a cost of $90,000. Ken Greenberg presented pictures of the mock Tudor Main Street Branch, now surrounded by suburban ranch style extensions and a tacked-on glass verandah. Wilfred Worland presented the Gerrard Street Branch, where a blockhouse has had a new entrance and stairway added onto the end, complete with strangely shaped windows and a sawtooth roof. New lighting and study carrels were also added. Last was Deborah Scott who described the new front stairway connecting the two levels of the library. The only other changes were a new sign and new lighting.

U of T Professor Jeff Stinson, author of the guidelines for all the projects, spoke for 45 minutes on the social responsibilities of the architectural profession. Donald McKay, who served as project expediter for the board, criticized all the architects for ignoring the architectural and political parties of the once noble public libraries and reducing them to yet another type of commercial service with "slick behaviorist environments designed to evoke the maximum response from the consuming public."

Eh oui, Gilbert Bécoud a chanté jeudi dernier à Massey Hall où il terminait une tournée de trois semaines qui incluait plusieurs villes du Québec ainsi qu'Ottawa. Pour ceux d'entre vous qui n'ont pas assisté au récital, Varsity était au rendez-vous pour voir Bécoud sur scène et pour lui parler à la fin du spectacle.

Bécoud est l'un de ces chanteurs français (comme Sacha Distel, Charles Aznavour, et bien d'autres) qui non seulement parlent l'anglais mais chantent aussi dans cette langue. Pour cette unique soirée à Toronto, il avait à faire à une salle comble. Pendant son tour de chant, il s'est souvent adressé en anglais au public. "What now my love" ainsi que "Monsieur Winter... Go home" étaient au répertoire.

Le public était enthousiaste; mais après "Je reviens te chercher" et surtout l'admirable "Monsieur Pointu", tous les assistants se sont déchainés. Il faut préciser que Bécoud était accompagné par son propre orchestre qui se compose de sept musiciens et d'un chef d'orchestre.

À la fin du spectacle, le public, debout, l'a acclamé pendant plusieurs minutes pour qu'il revienne chanter. Mais toute l'équipe était à bout de force et si Gilbert est revenu saluer, ni lui, ni ses musiciens n'ont cédé aux requêtes du public.

Plus tard, après que la salle se fût vidée et que les lumières fussent éteintes, Gilbert s'est fait interviewer dans sa loge. Il arborait un large sourire de satisfaction (un peu plus tard, il a déclaré qu'il avait "bien senti" le public torontonien lorsqu'il était sur scène).

Après une poignée de main chaleureuse, Bécoud s'est assis face au magnétophone et a répondu aux questions. Il aime son métier à-t-il dit: "rendre les gens heureux pendant deux heures" lui apporte une grande satisfaction. Il travaille toute l'année durant: il se produit en moyenne un sur deux. Il compose ses chansons lui-même, pendant dix à douze chansons par an. Son chef d'orchestre et son éditeur le suivent partout au cours de ses déplacements. Il est parfois assisté par d'autres compositeurs tels que Pierre Delanoe et Charles Aznavour.

Dès qu'il a quelques jours de repos, Bécoud va les passer sur la Côte d'Azur ou au Maroc. Gilbert, qui est originaire de Nice, ne cesse de rappeler qu'il est "un enfant du soleil," et que "le soleil est très important" (pour lui).

Pendant ces moments de répit, Bécoud dort, regarde la télévision et s'occupe de ses enfants (il en a cinq, dont le plus âgé a vingt-cinq ans).

Sur scène Bécoud est tour à tour gai, jovial, heureux, puis charmeur ou triste, comédien ou taquin (à un moment de la soirée, il est allé jusqu'à danser un "slow" avec une spectatrice sous le regard désapprobateur du mari de cette dernière). Souvent, il a un geste d'agressivité un peu désespérée et puérile; "mais," se dépêche-t-il d'expliquer, "ça n'est pas de l'agressivité, mais une sorte... d'autorité par rapport à la musique et au public."

Bécoud admet qu'il a un métier intéressant, de beaux enfants et une carrière brillante mais il estime qu'il n'est pas assez simple pour être heureux. "Pour être vraiment heureux," dit-il, "il faut être un petit peu moins intelligent qu'on ne l'est."

Ford joins human rights crusade

By DAVID ROSENBAUM

Gerald Ford, the 38th President of the United States, strongly criticized the Soviet Union for alleged violations of the 1975 Helsinki agreement on human rights, in a speech delivered at the Sheraton Centre hotel Sunday night.

Addressing the National Inter-Faith Dinner sponsored by State of Israel Bonds honoring J. Douglas Creighton, publisher of the Toronto Sun, with the Eleanor Roosevelt Humanities Award, Ford reported to the attentive audience of about 750 that "Jews in the USSR are actually being forced away from their religion" through varying forms of persecution. He quoted the London Economist in adding that the current review of the Helsinki accord being carried out in Belgrade will be a "mockery" if it fails to criticize the Soviet Union for persecuting its dissidents.

Ford maintained in his speech that President Jimmy Carter's "human rights" policy is by no means novel. He traced the origin of American concern with human rights back to Thomas Jefferson and the Declaration of Independence. He said: "It is this commitment of two centuries or more which brought the United States and undoubtedly Canada to Helsinki in 1975, and which brings it to Belgrade in 1977."

In a veiled criticism of Carter's Middle East policy, Ford told his audience that the United States "never should impose future terms, alone or with any other superpower, if we are to have true peace in the Middle East." He expressed pride in the achievements of his administration in developing "the most constructive atmosphere in 30 years" of peace in the area.

He added that the procedure which former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger used in ending the Yom Kippur War of 1973 and in negotiating the Sinai II agreement in 1975 offered "a better process for justice and peace for Israel and its Arab neighbours" than current American policy.

Ford concluded his 20 minute address by expressing his hope that all citizens of the world could live their lives "on a higher plane", in peace, dignity, and equality, thus filling the whole planet with "friendship and felicity."

Last of the red hot radicals

By TED STAUNTON

Reprinted below are a number of excerpts from the diary of Virgil Fitweiler, the last student revolutionary at the University of Toronto.

Fitweiler became involved with the radical underground in 1976, his freshman year at the university. Depressed over the breakdown of the movement earlier this year, he attempted suicide. He had already induced a semi-comatose state by reading, non-stop, 500 back issues of The Varsity, when he was found and rushed to hospital. His landlady later said she became suspicious because it was after midnight, and Fitweiler did not have his stereo on at full volume. The diary was discovered shortly thereafter.

Oct. 6: At long last there is meaning in my life! While passing through Queen's Park I chanced upon a man haranguing a rap audience of three squirrels and a wino. Apart from a slight stutter which forced him to add six syllables to any word containing the letter "a," he was the most spell-binding speaker I have ever heard.

I shouldered my way to the front of the throng, and managed a word or two when he concluded. It turned out that Ralph (his name) was also at U of T. His avowed aims are to raise the political consciousness of the urban proletariat, or "nerds" as he calls them, overthrow all forms of university administration in favor of "constructive anarchy," and to improve the quality of coffee available in Sid Smith.

Tomorrow, Ralph will take me to meet some of his friends. Before we parted he paid me the supreme compliment of letting me loan him five dollars for revolutionary incidentals and car fare.

October 7: I am now an official radical. Ralph's friends agreed to let me join their newly formed cell, though it was a near thing. While I passed the first test (staying awake while listening to 50 pages of Das Kapital) it turned out that I did not have enough Dylan albums to meet the minimum requirement. Nor did I own an autographed copy of Do It! It was agreed that as compensation I should donate my stereo to the communal property reserve. As others had already donated their favorite can openers and treasured volumes of Spiderman, I willingly made the sacrifice.

October 23: At our meeting this p.m. we all chose new revolutionary identities to symbolize our renunciation of the old life. Ralph is now Che, Herb is Fidel, Ferdie is Karl Marx, Carl is Leon Trotsky, and Vinnie is now Mao. I chose Herb Crump, a heroic, but unsung Canadian radical. Crump was the first Canadian to stop moving his lawn in protest of the jailing of Tim Buck. He expired while attempting to prove that his faith in the labor theory of value would allow him to use an electric razor while showering. My hair is growing nicely, but I fear my beard is not up to snuff. Ah well.

November 3: We have struck a blow for freedom with our first rally. I was not supposed to participate, but at the last minute Vinnie (Mao) came down with a hangnail, and Ferdie was committed to watching Leave It To Beaver, so I was chosen.

Thus, Che, Trotsky, and I assembled on the steps of Sig Sam. Things did not run smoothly. A slight flaw in the wiring of our bullhorn became apparent when Che stepped into a puddle while talking, and was propelled through the library doors. Reacting quickly, I took up the cry in the best rabble-rousing tradition. Unfortunately, the crowd that gathered did not like being called rabble. Their disagreement over this minor semantic pointed to my being fed into the book return chute in the library wall. I could have sworn I saw Trotsky aiding my assailants, though perhaps I misinterpreted his efforts to help me.

Apart from a slight concussion I emerged unscathed. Che, however, will have trouble sitting down for the next little while.

December 8: More problems. Our plot to free the rates in the psychology department and spray-paint the word "nougat" on all lab coats belonging to faculty has collapsed. Adding insult to injury the Marxist-Red Guard coalition no longer recognizes us as legitimate revolutionaries, claiming our record is pitiful. This means we will probably not be invited to their annual dinner-dance, held each year on the 28th; a pity as we had all sent our fatigues out for dry-cleaning.

January 11: Che has decided that our past failures were due to a lack of understanding of the proletarian mind. To better comprehend it we spend much time watching Charlie's Angels, and Happy Days. The poor quality of our TV reception has, however, driven away the less dedicated. Only the hardy remain.

January 27: Defections continue at an alarming rate. Che, however, is confident that everyone will return if he wins the Abbie Hoffman look-alike contest that he entered. As Che has blonde hair and a moustache, this would seem unlikely. On the other hand as no one knows what Hoffman looks like anymore, he might have a chance.

February 22: Only Che and I are left. Marx and Trotsky have both defected to the Young Progressive Conservative party. I always thought that they could not be trusted, as they frequently attended rallies wearing three piece suits and carrying attache cases.

Lately Che has become obsessed with the fear that he will be assassinated like Trotsky (the real Trotsky, not Karl). To allay his fears I must now walk back to back with him at all times. We have also given up sending out for Mexican food. I fear the end is near.

March 3: It is all over. I arrived at headquarters this morning to find a note from Che. He has forsaken the revolution. In fact, he has quit school in favor of a promising career as a used car salesman. It seems I was not the only one to recognize the power of his oratory, for he is already the assistant manager of his father's used car establishment, and has promised me a good price on a '62 Parisienne. With his note was a bill from my tailor, big enough to choke a horse, for minor alterations on my dress fatigues. I can't face the fascist repression any longer. I contemplate suicide by eating my own cooking. This is more romantic than quitting school, and besides, it is too late to get my tuition back.

PQ bringing in higher foreign students fees

MONTREAL (CUP) — Although Quebec ministry of education officials refuse to comment, it looks like differential tuition fees will be a reality for international students attending universities in that province. Earlier this month, Premier Rene Levesque accused McGill University of supplying tax-paid post-secondary education to "American kids, Commonwealth kids or people from all over," and now a vice-principal at the university has confirmed differential fees will be coming, although he wasn't sure when.

Vice-principal (Planning) E. J. Stansbury said the fees would be implemented according to the Ontario method, rather than that used in Alberta. Differential fees for international students were implemented this fall in Ontario colleges and universities, and the visa students pay two and a half times the tuition paid by Canadian students. In Alberta, where the controversial fees have existed for two years, fees are set by legislation after negotiation between the government and universities.

In Ontario, international undergraduate students pay $1,550 per year. Speculations by an official at Concordia University in Montreal earlier this fall set fees for Quebec somewhere around $1,500.

Although Stansbury sees "no particular advantage" to differential fees, he claimed there would probably be no drastic drop in non-Canadian enrolment when the fees are implemented.

But figures released recently by the Council of Ontario Universities (COU) indicate that international student applications dropped by 20.9 per cent in Ontario this September.

Stansbury termed concern over the figures from groups such as the Ontario Federation of Students "over-reaction" and said non-Canadian applications had been declining for a number of years. But the COU figures showed there was no significant change from last year in the national total of applications from visa students.

Levesque's remarks earlier in the month centred on figures for students leaving the province after receiving dentistry degrees from McGill. He claimed that the 55 per cent of McGill dentistry graduates who leave the province was attributable to their origin — presumably international. "Do you think that can go on forever?"

But McGill officials have presented figures showing that of the 166 students enrolled in dentistry at the university, 149 are Quebec residents. Of the remaining, 12 came from other provinces, three were American, and two were from other countries.

Differential fees are included in the Parti Quebecois platform, which reasons that while "Canadian students indirectly fund education through taxes, foreign students do not."

More francophones

MONTREAL (CUP) — McGill University will register 25 to 30 per cent of all francophone university students in Quebec by 1986, McGill's vice-principal of planning, E.J. Stansbury, predicted in an interview. The university currently accommodates four per cent of Quebec's francophone university students.

He said francophone enrolment is on the rise as anglophone enrolment drops, explaining that McGill enrolment is even lower than the projected decline.

Stansbury said the post-war baby boom is in part responsible for the decreasing number of university students in Canada, and suggested that Quebec's political situation might have influenced the accentuated decrease in Canadian anglophone enrolment at McGill.

He added that McGill may have picked up francophone students from l'Universite du Quebec a Montreal who were disenchanted with the recent lengthy strikes that upset the university for almost one year.

Norman Mailer laments life wasted in television limbo

"Of a Small and Modest Malignancy, Wicked and Bristling With Dots," pp. 125-148, Esquire Magazine, November 1977.

"Oh now is the time for your loving, and
The time for your company
Now, while the light of reason fades
And fires burn under the sea,
Oh, now in this age of confusion, I
Have need for your company."
"Children of Darkness", Richard Farina.

Norman Mailer has published a piece in the latest Esquire that has blown the roof off the sky. Mailer is in Limbo, meditating on the sins that may have brought him there.

The rooms in Limbo are like modern rooms in modern offices, cafeterias, highschools and universities and waiting rooms for dentists and neuro-radiologists. They are rooms in soft focus, the walls curved or with the impression of being curved because the invariable fluorescent light softens the straight edges of the walls, and the silvery grey pall shed by the light gives the room the look of the inside of a television set.

Limbo is redecorated every generation; in the Victorian era it resembled a Victorian sitting room with accumulated bric-a-brac and ashtray statuary. In fact it had been stuck in that pattern for more than three generations, since Jane Austen had first described it in a sentence in Mansfield Park (I quote from memory): "The time passed agreeably, with sofas and chit-chat and quarterly reviews, until the arrival of the dinner."

Then it came to resemble the floor of a bank or a stock market exchange (and Purgatory was a depression shack being repossessed by the banks of Limbo); but now it resembles the interior of a television set, and there are fears that it will be stuck in that image forever; moreover the horizontal hold is gone and the image is jumping like mad. Since Mailer has this eerie sense that he is inside a television set (perhaps on an early episode of The Twilight Zone), Mailer begins to reflect on the time he has wasted on TV. Hours, days, years of time gone watching TV (now we have an idea why Mailer has been a contender for the writer with the fattest ass in America; nothing encourages a fat ass quicker than hours before a television set. Hours spent appearing on it and allowing his ideas to be mangled by some of the worst hearts and minds ever to slide up the tube) and by himself; and not only his own time but the time of his children he had simmered in urns before the tube:

"... remembering how, on numerous occasions, with each of his seven children, he had closed the door of his own resistance to TV and let the little fuckers keep looking at the screen because it pacified them, which is to say took the lividity of their five-year-old nerves and slowly (that is, faster than sight) and buzzingly cauterized their nerve

He recalls an early appearance with Truman Capote on which he discovered that you could be, to yourself and everyone else present in the studio, splendid on television, and come out looking like a bum because you were given medium- and long-shots rather than close-ups. Or because you talked in paragraphs rather than sentences (which may have been a reason for the medium- and long-shots; get that long-winded son-of-a-bitch away from here).

And he tells about his horrific bout on the Dick Cavett show with Gore Vidal and his devoted cortege (Cavett and Janet Flanner) when for whatever reason he decided he would appear there to challenge Vidal publicly for his remarks in the New York Review of Books, linking Mailer and Henry Miller with Charles Manson. Mailer makes clear he objected not mainly for the individualism of the comparison itself, but for the fact that Vidal made this rather startling assertion and then went on to speak of the collective characteristics of "M3" as if merely linking their names proved the connection regally and indisputably.

I won't attempt to recount the events of that night. I never saw the program, but from the transcripts Mailer quotes (and his own rendering of the atmosphere of that night), it must have been one of the most electric happenings ever to be generated in the dreary wasteland of the talk show. Also one of the most misbegotten. Mailer argues that nobody really comprehended very well; certainly nobody's comprehension was ennobled and enriched by that particular piece of guerilla theatre. And at that point Mailer gave up the idea that he could do any good by going on television, for himself or for anyone else, and yet he continued to appear. And so became in his own eyes evil:

"If it was wicked to up the ante, it was evil to come to know the good and defy it, and the good, in this case, was to keep the hell off TV, which he did not. So he came to know his place in Limbo before he was even there."

The indictment of television and, by implication and sometimes by explicit metaphor, of the corporations, the technocratic institutions (FBI, CIA, IBM and K-Tel), the military and the industrial who live off the blood and bone marrow leached out of those who watch TV (and of himself for collaborating), the indictment in Mailer's piece is total. It is written with all-out rage, utter commitment, which is the one quality an artist can never be without if his work, or hers, is to be serious.

Mailer's style in this piece is not as good as but better than it's ever been before: Writers write better when they care passionately about what they are saying. Mailer clearly believes that it is vital to roar what he says in this piece, and by God the man writes like an Angel who has got electricity flowing through his veins instead of blood for his sins. "Of a Modest Malignancy, Wicked and Bristling with Dots" may be the first writing ever done at the true speed of light:

"... according to Einstein... no line can run straight in space, given the curly route of a lightwave and the oval field of magnetic force. Mailer sometimes wondered if he was one of the first to recognize that 186,000 miles a second was not the true speed of light, but only its calculated progress along a straight line. If you measured the speed of light by the time it took to wind through the waves, then a beam might travel up to a million miles a second in order to traverse 186,000 miles. That, doubtless, was one more reason why the sum of a million was magical to Americans."

U of T Hosts Gymnasts

The Varsity — Nick Marotta

Canadian Gymnast shows her form on the uneven parallel bars.

By NICK MAROTTA

Tuesday evening at Maple Leaf Gardens, Canada's Gymnastic program was put to the test. The Coca Cola International Gymnastics Competition matched Canada's future olympic hopefuls against representatives from nine competing nations. Canada's performance in this competition could be an indicator of how Canada will fare in the upcoming Moscow Olympics.

Canada's performance at the international level has not been of a high calibre in the past. This is due to the fact that they have been limited by poor facilities, lack of full time coaches and lack of aid from the government. However, there have been gradual improvements in these areas in recent years.

At a pre-tournament exhibition at the Benson Building on Monday, Canada's improvement in gymnastics was made evident. Gymnasts such as Warren Long, Phillip Delesalle, Karen Kelsall and Elsie Schlegel showed the form which earned them a spot on their National Team.

According to the women's coach, Mary Lee Palmer, Canadians have reason to be optimistic. If the girls perform at par with their performance in practice, "they will not only be competitive but they will have a good chance of winning."

Another reason for optimism is that the competition is fairly well balanced. Although various competitors have taken part in the Olympics, none of the athletes is head and shoulders above the rest. A good performance at this competition will present Canada's gymnasts with the unique opportunity to establish themselves as favourites for medals at the upcoming Moscow Olympics.

The Coca Cola meet will demonstrate to Canadians how hopeful we can be in regards to medals at the next Olympics. If Kelsall, Schlegel, and Long perform as they are capable, we can look optimistically towards the Moscow Olympics.

Interfac Report

By ANDY AUZINS

The surprising demise of Scarborough's offence headlines this week's Interfac football. Last week Scarborough scored only 15 points when they came from behind to defeat Vic. This week Scarborough managed only nine points. They still defeated St. Mike's 9-7 but it certainly appears now that the offence which was so highly touted at the outset of the campaign has eroded to a level where the playoffs could produce an upset of undefeated Scarborough. Victoria was the team that had held the Maroons (Scarborough) to respectable scores on two occasions but did not make the playoffs. Now perhaps we can look to St. Mike's to provide the defensive strength to slow Scarborough. Before St. Mike's can think of the finals they have the Engineers to contend with in today's semi-final at 2:15 on the back campus. The Division one final will be played the Thursday of the following week, again on the Back Campus but at 2:30.

Division Two playoffs are being played tomorrow with the matchups being U.C. and Dentistry, New and Trinity. Look for the winner of the U.C.-Dents game to take the championship on Championship Thursday (Nov. 10). In Division One, let's call for someone else to take the Mulock Cup and not have Scarborough finish undefeated.

Results:
Trinity 29 Forestry 14
Engineers 15 Victoria 11
U.C. 28 New 6
Scarborough 9 St. Mike's 7
Dents 18

Erindale continued winning in lacrosse, dumping St. Mike's 14-3. O'Neill got five, Bill Hurley three and Murray Barrick counted a lowly one. We know that they don't need all that firepower any way.

The Meds showed some of their prowess as they ran up some impressive figures in dumping the Engineers 13-3 and Trinity 10-1. Mike Clarfied got hatricks in both games while teammate Graham Loeb did slightly better, scoring five against Skule and following up with three in the win over Trinity.

Scarborough stayed on top of Division Two and preserved its undefeated season with a 6-4 decision over Forestry's A team. In an outstanding performance Roger Oruis scored all four of Forestry's points. Dave Robertson led the Scarborough team with three goals. Scarborough shut out the Engineers 14-0 with six goals by Gary Payne and four by John Capatelli.

New defeated St. Mike's and Ed Gal 8-5. Gal got three but in response, Lincoln, Wolski and McDonald potted two each for New.

Results:

Meds 13	Engineers 3
P.H.E. 15	New 8
Scarborough 6	Forestry 4
Meds 10	Trinity 1
Erindale 14	St. Mike's 3
Scarborough 14	Engineers 0
New 8	St. Mike's 5

Derick Colaw continued his domination of Interfac Rugby, eclipsing last week's performance and scoring an unbelievable 28 points as Engineering shutout New 36-0. Colaw appears to be a match for any of his Interfac opposition.

Jim Palsietia turned in some pretty impressive numbers as well, scoring 16 points as Phys Ed performed the second 'bagelling' of New in as many games. Phys Ed did it 31-0.

Results:

Law 11	P.H.E. 10
Engineering 36	New 0
P.H.E. 31	New 0
Law 14	Trinity 7

Cross Country Champs

By MARC RISPLER

Last Saturday at Kingston's Glen Lawrence Golf Club, the men's Varsity cross-country team captured the prestigious Little Cup for the 40th time in its 64 year history. The Cup is awarded to the winner of the O.U.A.A. meet.

Toronto earned the title by defeating its nearest rival, the host team, Queen's by 22 points. By doing so the U of T gained a measure of revenge for last week's loss to Queen's in the track and field final at McMaster.

The course was a demanding 10,000 metres of varied cross-country terrain which was handled well by the seven runners from the U of T. All Toronto runners finished within the top 17 positions. Varsity's captain, Brad Morley, led the team with a second place finish, outdistancing all but one of the 73 finishers.

The men's team was made up of Brad Morley, Paul Craig, Phil St. Louis, Andy Reed, Marc Rispler, and Terry Goodenough. The women were represented by Sheila Louise, Joanna Barber and Kathy Gittings.

The team is now looking forward to winning the Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union championship to be held on the same course this Saturday.

The women's race, which has still not gained championship status, attracted a remarkable 50 entrants. Only three women from the U of T turned in respectable performances in finishing the 4,000 metre course.

An unidentified Toronto runner makes his way across the Kingston course.

Rowing Team Wins OUAA Championship

By MAURICE DeWOLF

On Saturday, October 29, the U of T rowing team made its way to St. Catharines for the OUAA championships. The team over the course of the day accumulated more points than any of the other universities in the men's division and in doing so captured the coveted P.C. Fitz James Trophy. This had been the goal of the rowing squad since its resurrection at Toronto some five years ago.

The day began with heats in both the men's Junior Varsity and Novice Eights. Unfortunately the Novice crew consisting of 'Chico' Korbee, Steve Charron, Kevin Graham, Mike Lebow, Paul Coombe, Carl Hawkins, Luis Martin, Gord Thompson and coxswain Mark Fitzpatrick did not get off to a very good start and as a result they had to fight an uphill battle. They did not qualify but showed a lot of guts and determination in their race.

The other U of T Novice boat did much better, as they won their heat but in the final they too got off to a poor start and were not able to catch up to the Queen's boat. The crew of coxie Derrick Wulf, strokeman Tom Sheppard, Pete Leggett, Eric Mathieson, Wayne Sheppard, Paul Wraggett, George Dickeson, Steve Fellow and bowman Dave Smith have shown great promise throughout the season rowing exceptionally well.

The Junior Varsity race was one of the most interesting and disappointing for the Toronto outlook. The crew of bow Walter Ried, Mohammad Falat, Andrew Brooks, Doug Pattison, Garnett Orl, John Lowrie, Tommy Ujejski, Mark Turcott and Cox Bill Marshall got off to a great start (for a change) and were leading the early portion of the race. One of the two Western crews had just passed them and were regaining ground on them when another Western crew came over into Marshall's lane and collided with the smooth stroking crew from Toronto. It is interesting to note that this is not the first time that Western crews have been unable to stay in their lane. The Varsity Eight race last year is just one example. By the time that the two crews were able to separate, the pack had gone by. The U of T crew was determined not to be demoralized by these Western hooligans and held their heads high as they completed the race, the Western boat being disqualified.

The greatest success of the day came in the Lightweight Varsity Eight. After an undefeated season they rowed to victory at the championships in convincing style. The combination of Bowman Pete McKenna, Neil Hutchinson, Matt Lawton, Jamie Edwards, Dave Treliving, Bobby Boraks, Robbie Haag, stroke Brendan Mulroy and coxie Maurice DeWolf jumped to an early lead and never looked back. The Western crew tried again and again to close the gap but the gold medal squad from Toronto just kept pulling away, winning the Silver Challenge Cup.

In the final race of the day, the Varsity Eight, Toronto's entry of bow Nick Tintor, Stan Solos, Dave Harquail, Charlie Bartlett, Nat Findlay, Jim Edward, John Vanderlee, strokeman Tim Turner and cox Larry Marshall were out to defeat the Guelph Crew which had a number of national team members. By the time the race was about to begin the water conditions had become very rough. This seemed to bother the U of T crew more than some of the other boats, the crew from Trent got the worst of it as it sank $\frac{3}{4}$ of the way through the race. With a lot of water in the boat none of the crews were able to catch the smooth Guelph boat and the race was for second place. Western and Brock were able to finish ahead of Toronto in this race.

All in all, it was a little disappointing that Toronto was only able to come away with one win but the overall effort displayed by all the crews was the factor that gave the U of T the points championship. It is this type of spirit that was shown every morning at 6 a.m. at practice on the pre-dawn waters of Lake Ontario.

Blues Prepare For Western

By HUGH STUART

As the 1977-78 regular season opens, the big question is, "can the Varsity Hockey Blues bring home another Canadian championship?" As in any sport, the answer to that question will not be known until the final buzzer of the final game of the season sounds. But with impressive victories at Michigan and a narrow loss to York in the final of last weekend's tournament the future looks promising for the U of T team that Coach Tom Watt considers to have the most potential of any team that he has coached in recent years. However, the season must be taken one game at a time, starting with tonight's home game against what should be a tough University of Western Ontario team. (Varsity Arena, 8:00).

At this point in the season it is difficult to gauge the strength of the visitors but it is known that many veterans have returned from the Western team that split last year's regular season series with the Blues. As coach of the student national team, Watt is familiar with a few of the Western players and suggests that the Blues (and the fans) should pay close attention to center Peter Fraser. Fraser played in Europe last year and two years ago he was an All-Canadian. While Fraser has returned, the Mustangs have been forced to find a replacement for their fine goaltender because his eligibility has run out.

The Blues are a team that has the firepower to exploit this loss. It is slightly worrying that against York last Saturday the Blues had only three goals to show for their 42 shots. Certainly York goaltender Steve Bosco deserves some credit for this, but Watt agrees that another reason was that the Blues were not finishing off their plays. It is a tough problem to remedy but with each game and each of their rigorous practices the timing is bound to improve and the goals will start pouring in.

In the eyes of the Blues' critics (and according to Watt there are too many, "Why do people around here have to keep looking for our weaknesses instead of acknowledging our strengths?") the Blues' weakness is on the blueline. The Blues' coach dismisses this without a second thought, "I really don't think that we have any weaknesses." In fact, in carrying four pairs of defencemen the Blues have great depth on defense this year. The value of this depth has been illustrated already this season as Watt was forced to plug a hole left by an injury to veteran blueliner Lance Gattioni. Gattioni suffered a knee injury at Michigan and will be in a cast for six to eight weeks. Add on time for rehabilitation and it is conceivable that he could be lost for the season. The only other Blue sidelined by an injury is Jim Snelinger who will be lost to the team for five weeks with a separated shoulder.

It does not appear that goaltending will be a problem as both Mark Logan and Dave Jenner have had strong preseasons. Watt has been rotating the pair but it's not known who will be between the pipes for tonight's game.

One factor that does not appear on depth charts but must be taken into consideration is fan attendance. As Watt points out, last season was a case in point. "Do you know that we were more successful on the road than at home. In fact we're the big drawing cards for the other universities' home games." Watt further explains that, "the lack of home attendance has really disappointed the players. This team works extremely hard (any fan would feel tired just watching the Blues practice) and deserves much better support. As recently as four or five years ago, students used to line up at Hart House for season tickets and Varsity Arena was always full. This meagre attendance is a recent phenomena."

The Blues may win tonight's game, and hopefully the Canadian championship, without fan support. But that's not the way it should be. It's time that the students at this university get behind their most successful team ... starting tonight.

Side Line By-Line

By JIMO O'LEARY

What can you say about a football team that two weeks ago was rated number one in the country but has since lost two games and been eliminated from the playoffs? Some will say they choked; while those close to the scene will tell you that it has been a very successful season.

Success and winning should not be confused. In sports, there have been many winning teams which have not been successful in generating the camaraderie, and teamwork which is what team sport is really about. Everyone remembers the New York Yankees.

While they did not win the championship there can be little doubt that the Blues had a successful season. While winning is nice, it is not what intercollegiate sport is all about. Intercollegiate football is an extension of an athlete's university life in which it is hoped that by joining together through team work and discipline the student will learn more about the pressures and realities of the world he lives in. If a team can be molded in which the players give their best effort in an unselfish attempt to help the team while maintaining a sense of camaraderie, it will have a successful season, regardless of their won-lost record.

By this criteria the Blues have completed a very successful season. Ironically this success was particularly apparent in the games they lost.

Against Western, the Blues entered the fourth quarter trailing 19-3 but turned in a sparkling team effort and fell only seven yards short of tying the game. A lesser team would have given up.

In the playoff against Laurier on Saturday, the Blues entered the second half trailing by seventeen points. Once again, through a determined team effort, they rallied and were on the verge of tying the game when a poor call by an official turned the ball over to Laurier.

The success of the team was made possible by numerous outstanding efforts. The most prominent, was the play of the offensive line. Tim Allen, Simon Lee, Paul McMillan, Mike Steele, Bill Legge, and Mike Sokovnin made up a unit which epitomized team play and hard work. Allen, McMillan and Steele were all selected to the all-star team.

In what was really his rookie season quarterback Dan Feraday, made steady progress and showed enough to make the outlook for next season encouraging.

The versatile John Goodrow in many ways sums up this year's team. A dedicated team man, Goodrow did not complain on days when the ball did not come his way very often. On days when his running, blocking and passing led the team to victory he was quick to heap praise on his teammates. This is what makes a successful team.

In Chris Kotsopoulos, the Blues had the best receiver in the league. He played the whole season with an assortment of injuries which would have relegated many other players to the sidelines. Kotsopoulos was not caught up in the super-star syndrome but was a complete team man.

A large part of the Blues' success lies with the lesser players. Players like Joe Hawco, Dan Dominico, Mark McGee, Bob Hedges and Jim Mossop who did not get the ball often but were ready when their number was called. The attitude of these players can make or break a successful team.

The Blues' defence deserves special praise for their play all season. In a sense, the fact that none of them made the all-star team can be construed as a compliment. The defence played all year as a single unit in which almost every player was of all-star calibre. The fact that they were ignored on the all-star team only underlines the fact that no one was above the total team effort.

As the players hang up their cleats for the winter they should feel proud that they have had a very successful season. The success they achieved is better than the thrill of winning. Eat your heart out New York Yankees.

Joe Grant evades York's Romano Carlucci, while Neil Koraack (12) and Brad Tamblin (21) look on.

Proposal for summer jobs

By KATHY CANTY

A proposal for a student summer work program for 1978, in which the province will pay 75 per cent of the salaries of students employed in downtown revitalization projects by Ontario municipalities, was announced last Tuesday by Housing Minister John Rhodes.

Rhodes was addressing a symposium at the Royal York Hotel on downtown core issues related to small and medium-sized Ontario communities. About $150,000 in Ministry funds would be spent on the project, to be brought forward to Cabinet, said the minister, but he could not estimate how many jobs that amount would provide for students. It would depend on how many municipalities wished to participate, he added.

Under the program, young people would be hired by local governments, or chambers of commerce, to make studies of downtown core needs, to "prepare initial plans," and to sell the idea of downtown revitalization to the community.

"The students will be technically employees and, therefore, the responsibility of the agency which hires them," said Rhodes. "A number of smaller communities have already indicated that they would welcome such a proposal."

The summer work program is part of an attempt by the ministry to deal with the problem of decay in the downtown centres of many Ontario communities. This was also the purpose of organizing the symposium, according to Rhodes.

"It has become increasingly clear that the deterioration of the centre core of many of our towns and cities in this country is accelerating to the point which now seriously threatens the very survival of some historic communities," said Rhodes.

"Trends in our province indicate that the growth rate in our larger cities is levelling off, and during the period 1971 to 1976, Ontario's rural population has grown at a faster rate than the urban population." Moreover, "most of the major centres of the province are experiencing a lower rate of growth than the areas around them," claimed Rhodes. The population of Metropolitan Toronto, for example, between 1971 and 1976 grew by .3 per cent. The population growth figure for Peel Region, however, was 8.9 per cent, while for York Region it was 4.6 per cent.

These trends, Rhodes believes, make downtown redevelopment urgent at this time. The government has set aside $30 million for this undertaking. "Through limited strategic funding," the administration will help local governments, but "we have to mostly rely on the private sector for the funding of downtown revitalization," said the minister.

The most glamorous figure at the symposium was John Lindsay, author, former congressman, and ex-mayor of New York. After a reception sponsored by the Cadillac Fairview Corp. Limited, Lindsay spoke to an audience of municipal politicians from all over Ontario about "what's wrong with the American City."

The United States has a problem, said Lindsay, "because it has always thought of itself as a frontier," a non-urban land. The cities are not considered to be part of the country. They have been considered "orphan children," especially as their problems grew worse.

New York is a "city state" according to Lindsay. It is forced to pay the cost of welfare, for example, an expense which should be covered by the federal government, he said.

Right now an "army of hustlers is roaming the streets" of American cities. Jobless and rootless, they "terrorize whole neighborhoods" creating a climate of fear and reaction. The only way to deal with this "interstate nightmare," said

Lindsay, is through "national action" from Washington. Carter is trying to grapple with the problem but he has not yet discovered what to do, he added.

"You don't have that kind of pressure at the moment," in Canada, said Lindsay. But, "the day will come in Canada when you'll have to look to your federal government," he warned. "To resolve the rising problems of your small cities growing into big cities."

HERE'S THE WINNER of this week's contest. Hmmm . . . to say the least! The photograph was taken by Martin Crook and I wonder what he does during class . . . Many thanks and our congratulations go out to the runnerup, Larry Calcutt for a really impressive photo. We apologize for not printing it due to a lack of space. It will be run on Monday. The third contest starts Monday with the deadline for submissions being Thursday at 1 pm. So get out there and keep on clicking!

New Metro Library "best in Canada"

By ADAM KNELMAN-OSTRY

Over 3,000 people were on hand to witness Ontario Lieutenant Governor Pauline McGibbon officially open the new Metropolitan Toronto Library (MTL) on Wednesday evening.

The new building, designed by Architect Raymond Moriyama, houses General Reference, Fine Art, Theatre, Music, Science and Technology, Business, Social Sciences, History and Literature. The concrete and glass structure was packed from top to bottom by the general public on hand to listen to speeches given by various dignitaries and admire the new edifice.

MTL Board Chairman Edward Canning opened the ceremonies by remarking it was worth waiting "the eight years of planning, designing and building." Building and Site Committee Chairman Walter Cassels called the structure "the finest library in North America." He stated that "without this team effort, we would not be where we are today."

Metro Council Chairman Paul Godfrey jokingly added that the Metropolitan Toronto Council should free funds for the beginning of phase two of the library if the crowds using the facility are going to be as big as they were that evening. He recalled that at the time of the initial estimates, some council members called him the "king of extravagance" and that, judging by the turnout and the fact that the building was completed $2 million under budget, he was quite happy to assume the title.

Ontario Culture and Recreation Minister John Welch recalled that it was on a cold winter's day in February 1975 that he, along with Godfrey and Toronto mayor David Crombie, broke the ground for the new library. He went on to describe the sense of emptiness the bleak landscape evoked in him on that day. "What a magnificent creation you have now built. You have now erected on this once desolate spot a library worthy of the highest praise. As a high school student said to me, 'it has got plenty of atmosphere.'"

He offered his heartiest congratulations on the completion of "this, the largest library in Canada."

McGibbon reminisced of the real pleasure she took as a young girl in reading in the municipal library in Sarnia, where she grew up. When she came to U of T, she said, she used to study at both the Victoria and University libraries but used the Toronto Reference library because she found the campus libraries "too crowded." "I just hope university students will use this library as much as they do their own," she stated.

She went on to say that communities were judged by their libraries and that Toronto was lucky because it now was graced by "one of the best libraries on the continent." Quoting the eighteenth century playwright Sheridan, she said that a library was like "the evergreen tree of blossoming knowledge" and that people from all over the city will come from the "intellectual refreshment and enjoyment" this institution will offer.

After a presentation to McGibbon of an autographed copy of W. O. Mitchell's book Who Has Seen The Wind, the crowds moved into the foyer for wine, cheese and grapes graciously provided by the library.

OSAP accepted, with caution

By BLAIR HUNTER

The university administration's response to the proposed modifications of the Ontario Student Assistance Program (OSAP) for 1978-79 met with opposition but was eventually accepted by the Subcommittee on Admission and Awards Wednesday.

Despite the fact that the program is still in the planning stages, the report generally supported the directions it takes. Committee members, however, did acknowledge a number of flaws in the new plan.

The response specifically came under fire from student representative Brian O'Riordan who objected to the lack of consideration given to several important items.

He pointed out that under the proposed Ontario Student Grant Plan (OSGP) full-time married students will have to contribute more earnings to their education before a grant will become available.

Defending the administration, Chairman George Reid countered: "This is not an appropriate time to look at certain detailed questions, the purpose of this committee is to consider the general response."

Grant limitations in relation to the graduate student population did receive consideration.

According to Patrick Phillips, Director of Student Awards "The province is taking the view that unless you are an exceptional student and win a fellowship, you will have to finance your education through a loan."

Despite the increase of 255 additional Ontario Graduate Scholarships, the phasing out of OSAP grants, according to the report, "will have far reaching implications for graduate studies."

The university recognized that quite a number of graduate students who this year received need-assessed OSAP grants would not get this support in the future. The report recommends "that there be a further significant increase in the number of Ontario Graduate Scholarships for 1978-79."

The response also suggested "an increase in the number of grant eligibility periods to minimize the potential for adverse steering effects and to maintain accessibility for students entering long-term academic programs."

This proposal challenges the provincial government's new policy as being "academically unsound . . . (a) policy that students should shorten their period of pre-professional education."

The document will proceed to the Academic Affairs Committee and then presumably to the Ministry of Colleges and Universities.

The subcommittee also received the Report on Applications and Admissions For Undergraduate Degree and Diploma Courses.

Director of Admissions William Kent explained: "The overall decline in application to the U of T is part of a province-wide trend. In a specific case like the Faculty of Nursing's shrinking job availability, the media coverage may have steered some applicants away."

Kent did note that despite the decline more applications to U of T are received than can be accepted.

A stronger metro pushed in report

By BARBARA ANDREW

Is the report written by the Robarts Commission a blueprint for Metro over the next decade or a very clever political report designed to give more power to the provincial Tory government? This was the main issue of a forum at the St. Lawrence Centre Town Hall on Wednesday night.

The Royal Commission on Metropolitan Toronto chaired by the Honorable John P. Robarts, former Premier of Ontario, released the report last July. It presents 126 recommendations on the political, governmental and social structures of Metro Toronto and its municipalities. The report's most far-reaching recommendations are the direct election of Metro Council members, boundary changes and the elimination of Metro Toronto School Board.

The panel consisted of four people closely connected with the report: Anne Golden, author of a document responding to the Robarts report on behalf of the Toronto Bureau of Research; North York alderman Michael Smith; Dan Leckie, a U of T grad and a trustee for the Toronto Board of Education; and Colin Vaughan, formerly an alderman for Ward 5 and now a television journalist for CITY-TV on the Queen's Park beat.

The first three speakers placed the greatest emphasis in the report on the proposals for borough boundaries and education, as well as the question of greater local autonomy. They all agreed it was basically a good report though one or two points needed adjusting.

Vaughan's stance was radically different from the others. He maintained that the report is strictly a political document, Vaughan pointed out that since it was written by a former Conservative premier for a Conservative government. Robarts would report on matters beneficial to the Tory government.

The strategy behind the report, according to Vaughan, is to give Metro Toronto more power. The mention of greater autonomy for individual municipalities is a "red herring." Local autonomy is the last thing the provincial government wants, argued Vaughan.

October 31 was the date for all the municipalities to hand in their responses to the report. The Ontario Government is preparing its own response to be presented next February and may table legislation soon after that.

Since the present government is a minority, the attitudes of the other parties is very important, it was stated. Vaughan said that New Democratic Party (NDP) members haven't yet been able to develop a platform.

The Liberals have the most to win and the most to lose, it appeared from the seminar, since Smith's representation in Metro is weak. He has put together a mobile task force to determine what this position will be, said Vaughan.

Vaughan said that from talks with a number of cabinet ministers he feels they are "going to play Robarts' game." They will come out against the boundary changes but will let every thing else go through, he claimed. He expressed apprehension for a Metro slightly stronger but not strong enough to challenge the province.

Leckie discussed the problems of financial allocations under the existing system. The Metro School Board ultimately controls the raising and spending of some $700 million, he said. A major crisis, as he saw it, is that very few people really understand how this money is obtained or spent. In order to reduce this confusion, Leckie suggested that financial accountability be returned to local boards.

All members of the panel touched on the inadequacy of the discussion of finances in the report. Vaughan contended that finances aren't mentioned because the government does not intend to change them.

Radio Varsity open house

By MARK LUKASIEWICZ

Radio Varsity may soon hit the airwaves after a two-year absence. Addressing students gathered for the Radio Varsity open house yesterday, SAC Communications Commissioner Doug Gerhart said, "the question now is to decide the station's future."

Radio Varsity began in the late '60's and reached its peak in 1972 when it broadcast across the campus through 110 speakers in public areas, three carrier systems in U of T residence buildings and the Rogers Cable FM carrier system. SAC closed the station in 1975 as a result of mounting costs and bad management, said Gerhart.

Throughout 1975 Radio Varsity worked on a submission for an FM license from the CRTC, under the name Input Radio. The submission was rejected, and the station has remained closed since.

Gerhart said the chances of obtaining any money from SAC for the radio station this year are "very slim." He added the station will have to operate as an entirely volunteer, low-cost pilot project.

Many of the students who attended the open house in the Radio Varsity studios have no experience in radio but are interested in learning. Seated before an array of dials and switches, student Michael Ruehle, who says his main qualification is as a "stereo fanatic," tried to figure out how Studio C, on his left, could communicate with the control room in which he sat.

Gerhart said one of the first tasks will be an overhaul and inspection of the Radio Varsity studios. A manual will also have to be drawn up, he says, to train new and inexperienced workers.

"The biggest hassle will be the carrier system," he said. Many of the speakers around the campus have been damaged or destroyed, and some wiring may have been removed. Gerhart also stated the station will have to rely on volunteers to track down and repair the system.

Radio Varsity's first organizational meeting will be held next Thursday afternoon in the Radio Varsity studios. This meeting may finally decide the fate of the long-dormant station.

Correction

The statement in Wednesday's Varsity in the article "Arch. argue at Innis" that Donald McKay "criticized all the architects for ... reducing them (libraries) to yet another type of commercial service with 'slick behaviorist environments designed to evoke the maximum response from the consuming public' was incorrectly attributed to McKay. He did not make this statement.

TTC INCREASE UNJUST

To those of you concerned about Metropolitan Toronto we hope that you are more worried now than you were before Tuesday. On that sad day, Metro Council voted 24-12 to raise TTC fares, and to continue to do so every year for the next five years.

Instead of opting for a public transit system that attempts to keep prices down to encourage ridership and get as many cars as possible off city streets, Metro has sounded the first death knell in the TTC bell.

The higher fares from 50 cents to 55 cents cash fare and 40 cents to 43 cents a token for adults with corresponding increases for students, senior citizens and children will cost a minimum of $30 per year to the budget of the average transit-using household of one adult and two students. That is unfair, particularly for those Metro residents for whom the TTC is their only form of transportation.

For those with enough disposable income that they can make a choice in modes of transportation, the higher fares will result in more car trips, thereby further congesting our roads. Also, in this time of energy crisis, we should be providing incentives for the most energy-conserving forms of transportation and not even indirectly to energy-wasteful cars.

A well-used public transit system is vital to urban life. By the TTC's own figures, ridership will drop six million because of this fare increase. The lessons of New York and Chicago are clear. When public transit fares went up sending people to their cars and causing more roads and expressways to be built, this destroyed neighborhoods and houses. By raising TTC fares we are slowly travelling on that route.

The people who benefit from the TTC are not only its users and the public at large, but also those companies, especially those downtown, whose workers take the TTC to work. Can you imagine the cost to the Eaton's Centre or the TD Centre if they had to provide parking for their workers instead of their using the TTC?

Therefore the quickest solution would be to institute a one mill-rate increase on the property tax which would spread the cost of the TTC equally on all Metro taxpayers and businesses at a raise of about $7 a year. The Ontario Property Tax Credit System will ease the burden of those least able to afford the increase.

Only 15 percent of the TTC budget comes from the province. Metro provides another 15 percent, and users 70 percent. The setting of 70 percent for users is totally arbitrary and is kept to only as a means of raising fares. Roads are subsidized far more than thirty percent and if this "user pays" philosophy were to be consistently applied motorists would pay tolls on the 401 and Don Valley expressways, thereby freeing money for the general benefit of the public at large.

At the same time, the TTC with Michael Warren as its boss is cutting service, particularly in the city. Billions are spent on building up the system only to have it cut back. Is this the direction that we want to head for?

Other solutions include getting the provincial government which has reneged on Treasurer White's 1974 promise that grants to municipalities would match any provincial revenue increase, to the tune of $11 million a year to keep its promise. Also the feds who promised in 1974 to fund urban transportation have instead spent money on Otto Lang's flights, secret computers and Pierre Trudeau's salary. We are not so cynical as to believe that a politician's promise is not his word.

Since this has passed Metro Council, the issue can only be reopened if someone who voted in favor changes his mind. Since all the city representatives except for Fred voted in favor, get on the phone to your suburban representatives, you commuters, and get them to change their minds.

Beavis voted against raising the fares and all the suburbanites led by car-lover North York Controller Esther Shiner, except for North York Controller Ron Summers,

If you want to save Metro.

NUS - NOT US

With 750 votes against and 550 votes for, Ryerson students voted last week to keep out of the National Union of Students (NUS). For those who don't remember, NUS was the organization behind last year's National Student Day. It is significant that the only event that most students can associate with this organization is a miserable flop.

The NO vote at Ryerson is an occasion for all students in Ontario, not to mention the rest of Canada, to reassess their membership in an organization that has so far done little more than hold conferences to discuss what it should be doing.

One such conference took place last week in Calgary. The issues discussed were unemployment, student aid, education cutbacks and the NUS merger with AOSC, a student travel service. A hot item was the issue of whether NUS should recognize its Quebec counterpart, l'Association Nationale des Etudiants du Quebec (ANEQ). SAC thought the conference important enough to send 8 delegates even though SAC is currently running a $32,000 deficit.

The total result of this vast assembly of John Tuzys and John Doherty's was a collection of resolutions on the evils of unemployment, education cutbacks and lack of student aid. Presumably we are expected to feel better now that NUS is officially opposed to all the things decent, liberal-minded people are supposed to be opposed to.

NUS doesn't just talk either. For the benefit of those who still believe that unemployment is a good thing, NUS is preparing an "educational" campaign that will show them the error of their ways. They're also going to meet with the Prime Minister "to voice student concern about the economy and students' place within it." All over a cup of tea.

It makes you wonder why Ryerson doesn't want to join NUS, doesn't it?

Letters & Opinions

Gay halloween

Though I wasn't there to witness the event Monday night at the St. Charles Tavern on Yonge St., the news media certainly made sure that it didn't slip by unnoticed.

The morning paper told me how "Hundreds of people crammed the sidewalks to see the annual event" of "The homosexuals going to their Halloween Party." A radio station's D.J. commented on what a splendid time everyone had; laughing, giggling, throwing eggs and tomatoes, among other things, at the Gays.

I don't know... I just don't see how "civilized people" can derive pleasure from hurting the gay population and watching them as if they were animals inside a zoo.

Women's movement defended

I was impressed in general with Janet Smith's letter on Kate Millett, although I do not agree with her conclusion that the Women's Movement is "anti-family", "anti-men" and possibly also "anti-women" — Kate Millett may be all those things without the Women's Movement, therefore, being any of them.

But apart from that, I do think something should be said about the following passage in her letter which I think dangerous and misleading: "(Kate Millett) claimed that the 'roots of our oppression are that we get beaten up and raped'. Now surely even the 'right-wing' women would not be supporters of such oppression, nor would any decent man. How can this be an issue when no one is in favor of it?"

I think it's very dangerous, and wholly misleading, to assume that "no one is in favor of" the beating and the rape of women. The police and the judicial system by the ways they handle cases of rape and wife-beating show themselves to be, whatever they may say to the contrary, in favor of these crimes, since a woman who accuses a man of rape can have her whole sexual history explored in detail in order to prove that she must have provoked the assault. And a woman whose husband has beaten her is likely to have the police, if they do arrive to investigate such a charge, merely tell the husband to go out for a few hours and cool off. (This is not to say that women never cry rape when no such crime has occurred; but the courts are weighted to give more protection even to a man who has been charged and convicted previously of rape, than to the woman who brings up the charge. And before a woman ever appears in court she will have been sneered at and leered at by desk sergeants. Nor are the courts more generous in cases of wife-beating. Almost invariably a woman who calls the police is urged not to press charges, and is often beaten yet more severely for having dared call in the civil authority, and the more often she complains, the less likely she is to be believed. There is a case before the courts now of a woman who killed her husband when he offered to beat her; she is being charged with murder but is pleading self-defence, and it develops that there is a history of similar assaults by the husband, and that every time the police were called they did nothing to protect this woman.

Women being raped and beaten up is a question right at the centre of Women's Liberation, because many men, especially those concerned with the judiciary favor the crime of rape by refusing to admit it exists at all, and quite a number of men believe that "every man alive smacks his old lady once in a while." It is too easy to bypass and suggest these are not real issues.

Competition not inherently humane

Brad Hayes' critique of the views of terrorism expressed by Mario Cutajar made interesting reading. Like Mr. Hayes I believe terrorism unjustifiable under any circumstances, but I should show Mr. Hayes (and others) the trap he has fallen into en route to his conclusion.

He calls capitalism humanistic because it embodies the principle of competition which he calls

"the essence of improvement". He calls competition "the basis of life's existence (which) . . . has guided the improvement and development of life culminating in the evolution of homo sapiens." It is in the second description that the trap lies.

Evolution is a hypothesis which attempts to explain how the life-forms on the planet arrived at their present state. It is a theory of changes not improvements. There is nothing in evolution that entitles a given characteristic or life-form to be called an improvement in any sense than in the one area of survival capacity.

Evolutionary competition does not and cannot guide the improvement of life. To judge improvement, to say one thing is better than another, we need some standard outside the evolutionary process of natural selection. Mr. Hayes is not alone in making this mistake. To maintain that competition is the "essence of improvement" and a "highly successful principle" he must show that competition is the essence of improvement and a highly successful principle in human affairs. If he tries to maintain his position Mr. Cutajar will win the argument by noting the excesses that result when unrestrained competition prevails and will show that Mr. Hayes is guilty of fuzzy thinking by asking why, if competition is the essence of improvement, does it need to be modified by the democratic process.

But the real difficulty of accepting the evolutionary hypothesis and at the same time making moral judgements

(which is what Mr. Hayes is doing) lies elsewhere. The problem is that evolution destroys any basis for trusting our reason at all. Thought appears to be an epiphenomenon of chemical or electrical relations in the brain, itself a byproduct of a blind evolutionary process. With no basis for trusting our reason we have no basis for any form of objective morality by which to judge something as good or evil. Good and evil are thereby made subjective. In espousing evolution, parties as diverse as Mr. Hayes and communists, forfeit any claim to the validity of the moral judgements they make.

In Wednesday's Varsity there is a letter to editor which attacks a headline in last week's Review, "Toronto's top wop drops pop". Those writing the letter complain of the racial slur they say is evident in the banner. Well, first the head was not written by the author of the article, but rather by one of my assistants who is incidentally of Italian descent.

It is the content of a statement which makes it racist, not the mere words in it. As poor Lenny tried to teach us, they're all merely words. We apologize to those who were insulted, but we are amazed also at their narrow thinking.

Yes, ladies and gentlemen this is tasteless, and we're getting it out of our systems early. Admittedly not our own idea, but rather is by the National Lampoon Touring Company who are currently in town (see page 7), and we are merely following in their fine tradition of restraint and tact. So hit the road toad. Dig me pygmy?

James Reaney is induced to talk about the state of Canadian letters, the university, and his own works. The Dismissal, previewing tonight, centres around the university unrest of 1894-1895.

All-Canadian film breaks ground; Mitchell's Wind escapes permafrost

The screen version of W. O. Mitchell's Who Has Seen The Wind opened on October 20 in Arcola, Saskatchewan. It will have its big-city premiere in Toronto today. Yes, this is unusual — one of the hallmarks of recent Canadian films is an insistence on opening-night hoopla in imitation of the Hollywood-New York film circuit. But director Alan King has made quite sure that this movie's integrity is maintained, even at the sacrifice of fancy publicity.

Who Has Seen The Wind is the story of a young boy's growth out of the world of childhood. In the course of the story he moves from the security of innocence into a tentative reconciliation with the sometimes brutal world of "adult" reality. This theme has been dealt with before, but it's rarely handled with the sensitivity that both the novel and the film display. Neither bitter nor sentimental, the film is, above all, honest. It is interesting to note that the director, the screenwriter, the director of photography and the composer of the score all have extensive backgrounds in documentary film — though adapted from fiction, this too could be a documentary.

Director Alan King demonstrated his ability with children in his documentary Warrendale. In Who Has Seen The Wind he has further proved that ability. The stars of the film, Brian Painchaud and Douglas Junor, give sensitive and understated performances which any adult actor would envy, and with no previous experience. Both boys were ordinary Regina school kids when they were cast.

Painchaud plays the central character of the story, Brian O'Connell, and Junor is his friend The Young Ben. Neither role is easy. Brian has to deal with the deaths of a kitten, his father, and a gopher, in that order. Deep grief is perhaps the most difficult emotion to project on the screen, but Painchaud does it beautifully. The Young Ben is silent most of the time, suffering the humiliation of his father's poverty and drunkenness and, by his own behavior, isolating himself from everyone except Brian. Junor could have made The Young Ben a thoroughly revolting character, but his performance elicits nothing but sympathy. These two children, thanks to King's sensitive direction, are the film.

The adults in Who Has Seen The Wind are seen primarily from a child's viewpoint. In the scenes between Brian and the adults in his life, the camera is usually at his level, and the distance of the other characters' perceptions is further enhanced by their appearing in what are essentially cameo roles.

Here, too, the performances are strong. Gordon Pinsent as Brian's father, Jose Ferrer as The Ben, and David Gardner as the hypocritical Rev. Powelly are outstanding, and good support is given by Helen Shaver as Brian's teacher, Tom Hauff as his principal, and Charmion King as the town prig. When viewed outside Brian's perception, most of the adult characters appear as stereotypes of sorts. The audience remains allied with the child — he is the only one we are allowed to get close to.

Technically, the film is superb. The Saskatchewan of the thirties is brought to life both by the muted, almost sepia, tones of prairie landscape, and by the painstaking attention to period detail. Some of the detail is so perfect as to be almost distracting — I didn't think Cloverleaf Lard pails and Prince Albert tobacco-in-a-can existed any more. The special effects department, too, is to be congratulated, for the reproduction of a dust storm — it doesn't look like the tornado in The Wizard of Oz.

Perhaps the finest feature of Who Has Seen The Wind is that it is a truly Canadian film. It was produced on a cooperative basis with the Saskatchewan government, and traded jobs in production and the formation of workshops for a $300,000 grant, which was then matched by the federal government. Ferrer is the only American involved in the film, and director King was extremely conscious of not imitating American filmmakers. He says "the whole film business is about things that are fresh and different. That's the tremendous asset Canadians have: we're close (to the Americans), but different."

Who Has Seen The Wind is an important film. Its financing scheme should set an example to other productions, it is unashamedly and intensely Canadian, and it is a marvellous movie. Its "message", as I see it, is aimed at those with little faith in the Canadian film industry — all hope is not lost!

More bite for Bartok

"Exploit the exotic" may well have been the catchphrase at the Toronto Symphony this week, with a programme featuring works by a triumvirate of Eastern European composers. Perhaps "conservative exoticism" may better describe the works involved, all by composers whose compositions have settled rather comfortably into the popular repertoire.

Beginning with the Dances from Galanta, by composer Zoltan Kodaly, the symphony got off to a colourful start with this virtuoso orchestral piece. Most of the woodwind players had ample opportunity to show off, amid rushing string passages and lavishly orchestrated, full-bodied Hungarian melodies. It's a great warm-up piece, and in this concert provided a distinct contrast to the succeeding work — Bartok's Second Violin Concerto. This is a complex work indeed, and shows Bartok at a stage where he had fully integrated to Hungarian-Romanian folk idiom with his own personal style. Unlike compatriot Kodaly, who gives us the melodies verbatim, replete with lush harmonies, Bartok uses various elements of the folk-music — such as melodies in fourths, parlando-rubato technique, and so on — to achieve a very distinctive and personal expression within a rather traditional framework.

The concerto worked well programmed immediately following the Kodaly, for it begins with a Magyar-like theme which is the basis for a multi-faceted sonata movement. Soloist Silvia Marcovici coped well with this demanding work, and demonstrated a very able technique in the welter of writhing chromatic passages and finger-defying double stops. I felt that perhaps the contrasts of this movement could have been handled more deftly with a view to the architecture of the piece as a whole. and often the dialogue between soloist and orchestra might have been more dynamic. This is a work in which the orchestra frequently breaks in rather rudely upon the soloist's long parlando-rubato passages, and the latter is given good retaliatory material. Marcovici showed some good fighting instincts, but even more bite may have put her ahead in the battle.

Nonetheless, the lyricism of the Andante tranquillo movement was well-captured, particularly in the highly ornamented sections where Marcovici's faultless technique and expressiveness in the angular melodic lines stood her in good stead. The final movement — essentially a variation on the first — gave the orchestra a chance to exploit the various effects in the score — harsh pizzicati in the strings, rushing glissandi and folk instruments imitation.

As for the Dvorak Symphony No. 9 ("from the New World"), conductor Andrew Davis appeared determined not to make this performance yet another ho-hum rendition of a well-known work. Davis' Sturm und Drang approach lent special fire to the adventurous course of the opening thematic material, and there were some truly exciting moments — I'm thinking particularly of the transition sections, especially the move from the second trio to the coda in the third movement. The more espressivo parts of the symphony were often sublime, especially when contributions came from soloists such as English horn player Stanley Wood in the Largo second movement. Incidentally, the TSO is planning to record this work, and one hopes that the exhilaration of Tuesday's performance will manage to make it into the vinyl.

Beehive: children in the aftermath

History to the defeated . . .

... may say alas but cannot help or pardon, so they say.

The Spirit of the Beehive opens with a typical shot. An old van trundles through the flat bleakly photographed landscape 'somewhere in Castile, 1940' into a delapidated village, on the outskirts of which is displayed the emblem of the Phalange. Victor Erice's film, which won at San Sebastian in 1973, was really the first film to take as its theme the crushing effect of the Spanish Civil War on the people. This it does, necessarily in 1973, in an elliptical and aestheticized manner — though I'd say that is to its advantage.

We don't see anything of the victors here, only the defeated: worn-out faces, widows, and children. The film revolves around one of the defeated in particular, Fernando, the beekeeper of the title. Apparently of Republican sympathies, and a man of culture (there's a snapshot of him with Unamuno, the man who tried to stop a tank brigade with humanism), he has retreated into his enormous house, emptied of furniture it seems by the Fascists, to his books and his beekeeping. His wife Teresa, perhaps estranged, we see cycling to the station to mail a letter to a camp in southern France. The steam engine hauls away carriages of numbed faces.

There are two daughters, Ana and Isabel. The former is played by the same entrancing little girl who appears in Carlo Saura's Cria!, and here again it is her luminous dark eyes, which see everything and hold our attention and sympathy. The van that draws up at the town-hall is bringing a film — James's Whale's Frankenstein, and the two little girls along with half the village, each bringing a chair, women at the right, men to the left, come to see it. In a prologue the audience is told not to take it seriously, but six year old Ana does, and, her imagination set going, plies her sister with questions. Isabel teasingly says the film is a lie, that the monster was not killed but lives on as a spirit which certain words can conjure into being. Ana asks her mother. Spirits are spirits, she replies, with good girls they're good, but with bad girls they're very bad. Ana begins her quest for the good spirit.

This, the best part of the film, is slow and lyrical, fraught with the mystery of a child's view of a world out of joint. It's evident that Ana's fantasies grow out of her parents' isolation and defeat: they are not simply 'forbidden games', they are a search for the root of good and evil. The father takes Ana and Isabel mushroom picking and shows them which are good and which are bad. But the best, he says, are away up the mountain 'but we can't go there, we are too feeble.'

Fernando ponders at length the responsibility of bringing up children. In a journal he meditates allusively on the secrets of his beehive-house and on the sadness of its keeper. But the journal itself is an intricate evasion of responsibilities. One wonders how his carefully imagined microcosm can keep itself from outside events, with which, incidentally, he has a tenuous link through his old crystal radio and a magazine ironically called 'Mundo'.

In the evening Ana's spirit arrives as an escaped Maquis, whom she finds hiding and feeds, even giving him her father's jacket — for the spirit is her true father now. In one of many marvellous understated sequences we hear him caught and shot. Ana is found out and flees, traumatized. She has seen what her parents shun; the one inward looking, the other yearning for a beyond that is illusion. Husband and wife are brought together by it. Teresa burns her last letter. Ana, however, knows the spirit to be there, somewhere. (Eric has said he would like to make a film of her thirty years on.)

Yet the story is only half the story. For the qualities of The Spirit of the Beehive — its spare dialogue, its enigmatic surfaces and studied compositions, its wan photography (special mention for Luis Quadraño) give it the feel and concentration of the great early silents, though the style is Eric's own. The story is lyrically told, in images which leave much to be guessed at. And it has a score — I take it to be a Castilian folk song — which combines with natural sound and eerie silences to add to the sense of enigma and fatalism.

Such a glimpse of the skeleton of a lost generation in its cupboard might not be to everyone's taste. I found it compelling from first to last. It opens tonight at the Fine Arts.

Les Ballets Trockadero de Monte Carlo point an incisive finger at the ballet world. At the Queen Elizabeth Theatre, CNE, on October 26 this all-male dance troupe did an excellent job of stripping away ballet's surface glamour and poking fun at the pettiness and histrionics that are sometimes hidden underneath. Trockadero's main theme for the evening was to ridicule the prima ballerinas of the stage and show how absolutely ridiculous some of them could be.

Peter Anastos, who portrayed the temperamental prima donna Olga Tchikaboumskaya, was brilliant. In each major dance scene of Swan Lake that Trockadero performed, "Olga" made certain she was the central focus and continuously cast dirty looks towards her Prince Siegfried in warning lest he decide to drop her, take over the spotlight for himself or act in some way which would threaten her glitter. And, the lady meant business. The intensity of her determination to retain the spotlight emerged in physical aggression: Olga gave the Prince a stiff body check rather than glide gracefully past him.

The other members of Trockadero, dancing as the corps de ballet, entered the stage more like ducks in a shooting gallery than like graceful swans. They proceeded to roll their eyes and flutter their arms as though they were preparing for flight and each corps member showed that she wanted to be noticed and perhaps even recognized as the next prima ballerina.

All of their antics were sweeping exaggerations but the characterizations had been drawn with such a fine and careful pen that the Trockadero's equivalents in reality derived a life of their own. Trockadero made the viewer see how a real ballet dancer could be over-powering. That is, tempers can and do flare and there are ballerinas who want all the attention.

The audience was forewarned — at the start of the evening an announcement stressed that Olga Tchikaboumskaya was "in a good mood tonight." The Trockadero program made for a varied evening; they began with the illustrious Swan Lake and closed with a ballet school recital. At no point was the audience conscious of watching a real ballet. Everything was for fun. How could anyone watch a serious ballet performance when the ballerinas all had hairy chests and extremely muscular arms?

Yet the members of Trockadero knew the classical dance thoroughly. They had to, in order to appear so bad.

If you had never been to the ballet before seeing Trockadero, their performance last week would definitely make you want to go and see that which had been so humorously ridiculed. If you happened to be an avid balletomane then Trockadero made you all the more appreciative.

Hil I'm B.J.

And I'm Jeff! We've both got pert little tushes, get loads of gals, and are as cute as all get out. But enough of this idle jibber-jabber, we've got a review of the National Lampoon Touring Company "That's not funny, that's sick!" show to do.

Jeff, since you're new at this, why don't you warm up by reviewing Michael Simmons and Slewfoot, the New York based "country-punk" band that does a set to open the show as well as being the show's musical accompaniment?

OK B.J. They distinguished themselves immediately through their genially nondescript Charlie Danieleque, suburban-country sound. The apotheosis of the Kenny Rogers and Jerry Jeff Walker. Who needs them?? I do, and badly. Any band that says shit five times at the end of their closing number is alreast with me. As for their support throughout the show, these Gucci-ed, Cardin-ed cowboys can really kick ass in a wide variety of musical styles.

Hey, not bad at all, Jeff. A little pretentious, heavy and overwrought at times, but practice will help.

Anyways. Do you read National Lampoon? Sure you do. You and thousands of other snot-brained, sequestered and standardized students. Maybe what you twinks don't realize is that this fetid rag peaked about two years ago and it's been downhill ever since. Nonetheless, it's still a giraffe's scrotum ahead of its nearest competitor.

Warning! "That's not funny, that's sick" is not a live version of the magazine. Despite the fact that the bumwipes writers created it, this show is pure cabaret-revue with a NatLamp attitude.

Let's get straight to the point: see this show (tonight and tomorrow night at the El Mocambo) and you'll laugh so hard you're gonna pop your pustules. In essence, Wotta buncha kray-z-kidz! Anybody who can cut up basketball, gymnastics, Peter Bogdanovich, dope dealing, Rod McKuen's Phone Mate, confession (Priest to sinning girl: "Was his tiny warhead apparent, child?"), singles bars ("Bitch...bitch...C'mere, you love it"), Moby Dick, LSD, mix it with outrageous bulseye parodies of Dylan and Baez, John Denver, John Lennon, and Dolly Parton ("Clap is just the B side of Love"), and serve up the whole shooting match in one tight hour and a half package scattergun zaniness deserves to be seen or at least ignored with respect.

The only bit lifted from the magazine itself is the "Jesus as standup comic" one, featuring such heavenly thigh-slappers as "My family was so poor I was born in a stable. What do you say to a leper to get rid of him, 'Flake off'? I come from a weird family: my mother was a virgin and my father a dove. For years people called me the Birdman of Nazareth." This routine was exhumed with heteronomous panache by Andrew Moses, one of a quartet of spiky post-teenage misfits who make up the troupe. The others, Wendy Goldman, Roger Bumpass and Elanor Reissa turn in equally fecund performances, with Bumpass in particular filching fave raves from these grizzled critics.

See this show and be elevated from your schoolwork-induced torpor. Miss it and we'll pluck out your corneas.

Live Peace under the neon palms; peace, love & casual sex.

Zastrozzi only a little perverse; sanity, despair, and swordplay

Zastrozzi, the great intellect of Europe, is having nightmares. He dreams that he is leading the forces of good in the battle of Ragnarok, and winning; the defeated Prince of Darkness is himself. He wakes up grinning...

George F. Walker's new play, at Toronto Free Theatre, is not quite a melodrama and not quite a Gothic tale a la Mrs. Radcliffe, or Shelley, whose plot it was. Instead, Zastrozzi draws its effect from intellectual incongruities embodied in crisp, economical dialogue. The six roles are familiar types: master criminal, brutish henchman, and heartless whore on the one side, and on the other artless innocent, wise tutor, and unblemished virgin. But each lives in a solipsistic universe, with only Zastrozzi able to impose his vision of reality on the others, as his is a cosmos of wantonness and destruction, rounded with a little ennui.

The opening night audience had to decide, as will each successive house, how seriously we are to take Zastrozzi. Stephen Markle seems less sinister than affected early in the play, a caricature of revenge, and not nearly so formidable as he describes himself. But Walker's convoluted mindscapes make Zastrozzi and his creatures progressively more plausible, and he does eventually stifle the reckless humour of the onlookers — or at least redirect it to the mental polarities the characters have reached.

It is a great relief, too, to find that the leather-and-swords decor could be sustained in actual combat and were not there merely for the fantasies of the voyeurs in the audience. Fight-master Patrick Crean has arranged some deft and convincing sabre-rattling, though more exuberance than blood is spilled.

Not all the magnificent physiques in the play are paired with wits as subtle as Zastrozzi's. Verezzi (Geoffrey Bowes) retains no other logical function than the use of language, and Diane D'Aquila plays the exotic gypsy Matilda with a generous assist from her cantileverer. Fortunately her acting triumphed over her costume and added greater character dimensions than Valerie Warburton was able to instill into the slim-waisted and thick-witted innocent, Julia. Walker's script did give each character, even George Bufo's archetypal bravo Bernardo, excellent witticisms and aphorisms. Unfortunately, all the actors tended to chew their pithy statements overlong before spitting them out, soddenly.

The irony in the play is not the result of any character's self-realization (save perhaps Victor, the ex-priest, played with laudable understatement by David Bolt) but instead results from the complete lack of understanding by one character of another. For example, Verezzi is convinced that he need not flee Zastrozzi — a creature, he thinks, of Victor's imaginings, and at the same time Victor knows that Verezzi's 'followers', for whom he insists on waiting, are unreal.

A whole evening of irony is not an unpleasant experience. Walker has taken his penchant for exotic locales and obsessed characters as far into abstraction as he can easily go. This play need not have a time or place; his world is very like that of the elegant James Branch Cabell, or more, perhaps, like that of E.R. Eddison, where villains are magnificent and the world is 'sensible chaos, yet grounded in an infinite order'. Like autumn, Zastrozzi's despair sweeps all before it. You will enjoy watching him being sane.

Articulate and witty Can Lit

James Reaney, poet, playwright, printer and myth-maker, is on campus for the next few weeks while his new play, The Dismissal, moves out of rehearsal and onto the Hart House stage. Reaney is well-informed and sure-tongued about his craft and his contemporaries. The Varsity sent roving reporter John Wilson like a lamb to the slaughter in the following clatter of conversationalists.

I understand you once wrote for The Varsity?

Oh (laughing) I hardly remember... I wrote in longhand, couldn't type, wrote a few Champus Cats... I was too scared of the staff. I wrote a lot for the Christmas supplement and the U.C. Undergraduate.

You won the Governor-General's medal for your very first book of poetry?

It was practically the only book of poetry published that year.

Do you say this in your own defence? or...

The Governor-General's Award... at that time it was a whole mockery. It was given by the Canadian Authors' Association, with no money. If you won it, you had to face these old fossils, which I refused to do. They gave the award for fiction that year, or a few years afterwards, to Igor Gouzenko for his dreadful, dreadful novel... There are too many medals in Canada.

What would you prefer to see?

Well, I think that the financial support system, grants, work much better. If you really feel you want literature, you want to support it. There's a medal complex in Canada.

How did your own poetry develop? You were a short story writer?

I was both at that time... I really started to write poetry when I got to college.

How did you distinguish good from bad in those days? Who were the prevailing fashions?

I remember trying to have an Auden-Spender tea in my room, reading a charade by Auden, a very in-joky, Oxford thing. Halfway through people gave up... It put me off Auden for several years.

Who do you suspect is today's equivalent, in influence? Have we bypassed Yeats and gone on to Bob Dylan?

Probably people like John Berryman... It's the Allan Ginsburg style. You see, I've had to teach these courses...

What do you see replacing the Ginsburg style?

Well, it's never really taken over in Canada. It's the Global Village style, William Carlos Williams; it goes back to Whitman. But Canada being what it is, it's got various camps — when I went to college, I was first published in the States, of all places, but the Northern Review in Montreal, run by J. Sutherland — that would be P.K. Page, Abraham Keon, the very early Irving Layton — Sutherland prophesied practically on his deathbed that American poetry would take over; it seems to me that if you look at Scott, (not at Klein, he's in a Jewish tradition), but at all those English poets, they are influential... if you look at Atwood, it's a combination of the chopped-up line you get in the United States, but twisted different ways, she isn't just letting her lines be imagist or random, or reversed... she's very controlled. There's a very controlled feeling.

What do you think of the B.C. people? Or, rather, the West Coast entity, there's an infiltration from California. The 'little' magazine scene is constantly going on...

They're very vociferous, round about projective verse. Walt Whitman in new clothes. They do go on, talking more about it than they actually do. I'm very interested in bill bissett, who's a thorn in their flesh. That's why Warren Talman, an American import, but a very good critic, whose book on the movement has never come out, because bissett suddenly turned nationalist.

And, in Ontario, a well-rooted poet?

Atwood. Marty Gervais.

To go back to your own writings — you wrote poetry, principally, at first. Then there was a shift to plays. When did you first try to work for the stage? The children's plays?

Well, I worked with marionettes; I did a translation of a comedy of Plautus using marionettes. I remember showing Bob Gil a play... there was no outlet for original plays. (I couldn't type).

Do you now type?

Oh, yes.

Perhaps my questions are off-base; I don't know enough about your interests — I'm surprised to find out that you have been interested in marionettes so long. I'd say that the first time I heard much about what you were doing was The Donnelly's; has that, do you think, changed people's image of you, distorted your image? I think people expected Baldoon, because it was the play next following, to be very much like the Donnelly's, and were disappointed when it was not.

So you're asking me, did I change.

Not that you've changed, but are you aware of the public perception of you; is that a distortion of what you would really like to do?

Well, I'm not really in charge of the public perception of myself, the public is in charge of that. I just write the plays. The fact that we got audiences for them, and a lot of reaction and interaction to their publication, suggests that the theatre finally works. It takes a lot of work, it's not easy.

Colours in the Dark was your first successful play?

No, no. Listen to the Wind was a local success. And the two plays I did with the Alumnae, Killdeer and Easter, were premiered in Toronto.

The Varsity — Steve Petramik

Reaney describes the dragon of student discontent.

Controversial. Then, of course, you had to deal with critics like Nathan Cohen, who no matter what you did gave you bad reviews, and with critics like Herbert Whitaker who always gave you...

Kindly... There's a new book out on Cohen, in which he is praised as being a developer...

Cohen didn't develop anything. He made two lucky guesses. One was Arthur Hailey. (To give him his due, he did like a short story of mine.) And he discovered John Herbert. I think half the time he was probably right in denouncing things. But he always denounced. And as a result, if you looked at the imagery of his reviews, he quite often liked it, but he couldn't get rid of the image. It was successful — people read him. But when he came to the opening of The Killdeer, he had a copy of the New Yorker, and he picked his nose and read the New Yorker all through it. There's something the matter — I didn't know him at the time — I think his line was 'the play should show a reverence for life', or something — I couldn't get anything out of his criticism to build better plays. He was a theatre personality. It's good to have those around.

I don't know their work well enough. The critics don't write books about the theatre. They don't have the time, or their editors don't pay them enough money. We need critics in Canada who have theories about plays, aren't afraid to write a book or two. That would be fun. It is a very shallow theatrical scene. We have a big thinker on drama like Frye — I'm doing a workshop in which we're trying to develop an Ontario commedia dell'arte — using his Anatomy of Criticism — and doing that, we've got Aristotle on our hands — but there's no one between him and the front-line critics, like Cohen and Fraser and so on; there's no one like Jan Kott in Poland or Kenneth Tynan. I was glad to see Clive Barnes fired — he deserved to be fired — they said he was too intellectual; he liked chi-chi... people.

He liked openings and not not plays. Someone said to me recently, a propos of theatre criticism, that theatre is an actors' medium.

Well, it certainly helps if you have a band of actors like the NDWT company... last night we went to a tavern at College and Bathurst and discussed the imagery in the play. That's very nice, that they are literary enough to know about writing. Not all actors are like that.

When did you first come in contact with them? With Keith Turnbull? I noticed that you did a play in the sixties with him out at MTC?

Oh, it was before that. In London, we co-directed there about 1965, when he ran a summer of Canadian plays. Martin Kinch and Paul Thompson were also there then.

And you've all done well by moving to Toronto?

Well, I haven't moved to Toronto; and Thompson keeps moving back to his farm, I believe. Listowel.

Let's move back to the idea that there is an intellectual scene in universities. What do you remember of U.C. when you were here?

The Undergrad was very exciting. And a magazine called Here and Now which ran for four or five issues.

Who were the intellectual figures on staff at that time?

Frye and McLuhan. And in the English department, Priestly and Wadehouse.

From being around the university this year, and from London, is there anyone else who you find interesting, creative?

Macpherson — not only Jay but C.B.

More next week for culture-vultures.

Just a Rumour

At first there were all these people in the Seneca College parking lot. It was twenty to nine and they all looked worried. Someone had hidden the Field House and those overpriced tickets were feeling like lead admissions to the autumnal breezes of Scarborough.

Normally we wouldn't have worried. After all the warm-up act was only Thin Lizzy. But there was a catch — the promoters were experimenting with a daring format, designed, perhaps, to eliminate congestion on that fair borough's arterial passages after the show. The main act was playing first. And we were hearing the howl of the wrong wind.

Concert organization being what it is in this city, however, the lights went out ten minutes later than even the really lost among us feared. Then we dwelt in darkness listening to the faithful bird-whistling and screaming for Z.Z. Top.

Finally the lights came up; The Rumour (bob Andrews, Brinsley Schwarz and friends) complete with four piece horn section found their instruments and Graham Parker, all black and white with grey shades, bit the microphone. In a moment the barn was filled with R&R beat, Parker's raw voice and 1,900 bored seventeen year olds.

Admittedly the band didn't hit stride until their fifth song. The sound mix was bad (they were using, inexplicably, the other act's equipment which wasn't used to having music played through it) but the ten pieces weren't exactly together either. Playing rhythm and blues, or rock and roll, demands a tightness of instrumentation which boogie bands needn't worry about. When a piece of music has no rhythmic pulse it doesn't matter that the musicians aren't in time. And a band like Thin Lizzy, which changes chords once every two or three minutes, eliminates most chances of doing anything wrong by the simple expedient of not doing anything.

Parker, on the other hand, is attempting a complex form, depending on superior musicianship, tact, and perfect timing. No one is allowed solo room, saving an occasional chorus which Parker cuts short when he feels the need to sing again. His voice, which resembles Bruce Springsteen's edged with vitriol, is the centrepiece. It separates him from any other 'New Wave' figure and allies him with his influences in being expressive, almost interpretive. Johnny Rotten's voice, for instance, is capable of snarl and sneer and is an ideal medium for his lyrics, but it doesn't seem malleable. Parker can spit one moment and croon the next.

The band's set was devoted, primarily to new material. The kids with the dope bladders didn't know any of his music so it didn't matter. In fact little of the audience's response mattered. Parker didn't quite turn his back, but his stance amounted to a declaration that 'We're doing what we do. If you don't like it, demand your money back.'

The crowd didn't like it much. They didn't seem to notice the rhythm, or the tight melodic lines that wedge themselves in your head. And they didn't understand Parker's presence on stage. He is anti-charismatic. His movements all come from the shoulders, as if he were a marionette, and argue a tightly controlled ball of rage and derision. The control separates him from the authentic punks, and his refusal of the theatrical sets him apart from the primal-scream phonies. It's a brittle, unpleasant, sniping figure and it's coming from the heart, if he has one.

The audience looked uneasy, or bored (depending on the depth of their dullness). They didn't want an encore. Parker threw 'Pouring It All Out' at them anyway and stalked off.

The closing act, Thin Lizzy, was much worse than anything you've ever heard about them. They're not worth the bullets, or the stains on the field.

Rare Beef well done

Last Tuesday and Wednesday night, the Colonial Tavern provided the unlikely scenario for a rare appearance by Captain Beefheart and the Magic Band. After a three year absence from the music scene the Cap'n has decided to leave his cabin in the California redwoods to return to recording and performing. The last time he was here, at Con Hall in 1974, it was to promote his album Unconditionally Guaranteed. That concert, that album and the one that followed it, Bluejeans and Moonbeams, were incredibly dire.

But these are best forgotten, as the Captain will himself admit, and after his stint at the Colonial one begins to doubt that they existed in the first place. Unlike the bulk of still functioning artists of the 60's, Beefheart is not just a living legend, he is still an artist of searing brilliance, as he easily proved this week. The old material retained its fire and intensity and the new material revealed a further progression of his art.

The Magic Band, though it includes no original members, once again deserves its moniker. The musicians, who learned all they know about music from Beefheart, perfectly recreated their unique studio sound in the club environment. As usual, the band has two guitarists, both of whom specialize in slide ("steel appendage") guitar. The drummer too is special, for though his style is intricate and jazzy, his power befits Deep Purple. The fourth man more than adequately doubles on bass and keyboards. As for Don Van himself, besides exhibiting his stunning vocal talents, he treated us to his much heralded soprano saxophone and harp playing.

Time change is a key part of The Magic Band's music, which can only be loosely described as blues-rock-jazz. But unlike the time changes practised by most jazz-rock fusion bands, Beefheart's are pleasingly fascinating rather than oppressively egocentric. In the hour and a half that they performed each night they managed to cover the whole range of their material. They played songs like "Electricity" from the first album, "Safe as Milk", and "A Carrot is as Close as a Rabbit Gets to a Diamond" from the as yet unreleased 'Bat Chain Puller' album and everything in between (that counts).

The audience on both nights was comprised entirely of Captain Beefheart fanatics, a group that have to be the world's ultimate cult. The reception for the band was wild, and although a few personal favourites were missed, everyone left satisfied if not a bit drained. The fact that some people came from as far away as Winnipeg to see these gigs attests to the fact that The Magic Band make some of the most powerful, albeit odd, music on the planet.

Frisco rockers boogie in Seneca sauna

They took a long time to get here but last Wednesday the Grateful Dead finally rolled into Toronto. The Dead have some sort of cult following wherever they go and Toronto was no exception; the Seneca Field House was packed.

As the Dead took the stage, guitarist Bob Weir said "Welcome to San Francisco" and the band proceeded to play three hours of their own unique brand of rock.

In the sixties, the Dead were known for playing acid-rock; they jammed for hours on stage, put on free benefit concerts, and were regularly busted for drugs. Ten years later the music is more defined as the band has explored such new avenues as eastern mysticism (on the album Blues For Allah) and full orchestral and choral arrangements on their latest effort Terrapin Station.

The Grateful Dead are essentially a seven piece band: two guitars, bass, keyboards, two drummers, and a female vocalist. They are a live band and only rarely do they come across with the same power on vinyl as they do on stage.

Each song starts as the musicians work around one simple riff. As the song progresses, the rhythm section develops the riff and the two guitars take off, moving the band towards a crescendo. That's why it's such good stoner music. Everything builds till all Hell is let loose.

However, Seneca Field House as a concert venue deserves to be taken out into a field and shot. The chairs were tortuous and the temperature was sickeningly high. Organization-wise it was another C.P.I. horror show.

The show was good Dead, but not vintage Dead. The solos were a little too long and the show was a little too loose. Still the Grateful Dead are a special band and their fans adore all the over-indulgences. A little San Francisco magic can't be too bad, kids, even at Seneca.

Souvairan botches Beethoven

A student of Pierre Souvairan assures me that the pianist's recital in Walter Hall last Sunday was not typical of his ability. Considering his good reputation, this must be true; Souvairan's performances of Chopin and Schumann had some style to them, but his Beethoven and Mozart were puzzlingly mediocre.

Souvairan is likened — according to my publicity sheet — to Alfred Cortot, an important pianist and conductor, also Swiss-born, active in the first half of the century. The comparison is quite valid on a few grounds: like Cortot, Souvairan stretches his tempos freely, drops notes, and betrays a "soft" technique fundamentally different from the iron of a pianist like Rachmaninoff. But the most important items of comparison — Cortot's originality, passion and authority — for me had few counterparts in Souvairan's playing.

His perfunctory reading of Mozart's K.330 sonata evinced many bad Mozart habits. Melody was awkward and halting, phrases were lengthy and inconsistent, and inner voices were trodden down into a colorless fabric that reminded me of the orchestra you can barely hear behind a vocalist on an old acoustic recording. The first movement was rushed and plagued by unnatural tempo changes. The second movement, Andante cantabile, had no singing at all, but on the other hand had many poorly considered broadenings of tempo. The final Allegretto made only slightly less uncomfortable listening.

Beethoven's Op. 101 sonata was a clumsy affair. Souvairan's way with the opening Etwas lebhaft movement was brusque, too fast, and inattentive to phase markings. Like his Mozart, his Beethoven was littered with pauses that sounded more like memory slips than expressive nuances. I was most surprised by inconsistency of the playing; after shamelessly retarding the syncopated transition bars before the development, he accelerated through the rest of the movement.

Recklessness was a little more becoming to the march-like second movement. The best moments in the remainder of the sonata were the contrapuntal ones; Souvairan has admirably independent hands.

Chopin's Ballade in F minor certainly worked a reversal in Souvairan's playing. He captured a much more natural pace and an authentic sense of climax, and was very effective in the agitated passages near the end of the piece. Schumann's Symphonic Etudes comprised the longest and most difficult item on the program. Souvairan played, as usual, with great rhythmic freedom, but this style sat better with Schumann than with Beethoven. Many of the variations were nevertheless far short of successful. No. 4, for example, lacked both balance and consistent phrasing, while No. 12 was too blustering to be enjoyable. Nos. 6, 8 and 9, on the other hand, were fleet and exciting despite the effort and concentration they demand.

Dvorak: Overtures (Amid Nature, Op. 91; Carnival, Op. 92; Othello, Op. 93; Husitska, Op. 67). Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra, Rafael Kubelik (DG 2530 785).

The "Carnival" is far and away the best known of these overtures; I won't pretend I knew the others. They can't equal it, but are very much worth hearing. The academic appeal of "Amid Nature" and "Othello" — allegedly the philosophic companions of "Carnival" — adds to the value of this interesting disc.

Kubelik's conducting is brisk and potent, and the BRSO sounds muscular and very agreeably transparent — like the Cleveland of old, but not as polished. Kubelik sometimes wavers in slow and subdued passages (the opening of "Othello" is curiously aimless) and falls short in maintaining balance (the G of the cellos is much too loud in the final C major chord of "Husitska"). But for animation and rhythmic energy you can't beat him; the opening of "Carnival" is sensational.

The DG sonics are first-class. My only objection is to the excessive division between channels of first and second violins.

Arthur Kaptainis

Strauss: Ein Heldenleben. Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, Karl Boehm (DG 2530 781).

There was a time when the idea of the artist as hero was not passe. Hell, there were once artists and heroes.

Richard Strauss' musical autobiography — written only one third of the way through his life — would be Ein Heldenleben, "A Hero's Life". Perhaps the apotheosis of program music, the symphonic poem deals with the life of a hero (Strauss) who has his inspiration (Strauss' wife) and his foe (the critics). While Strauss wins the battle that occurs in the middle of the work, the audience is often the loser. Although a difficult work, in every respect the main challenge lies in making a coherent whole out of a number of obvious sections.

Karl Boehm conducts the Vienna Philharmonic in a new recording from Deutsche Grammophon. For the sufferers who have had to rely on mono recordings for proof that Heldenleben really is a coherent piece of music, this is the disc to buy.

We are given the usual broad exposition, the grotesque woodwinds as critics, the lush violin for Mrs. Strauss.

The whole coherence question becomes laughable on a recording such as this: whether Mrs. Strauss fits in or not, the performance is musically integrated. Heldenleben lives or dies by the orchestra, not Mrs. Strauss.

Beyond the usual excellence of DG pressing, one finds the glories of the VPO, putting the rival DG recording by the Berlin Philharmonic and Karajan to shame with precise and clean execution. Boehm refuses to overemphasize climaxes and destroy the work's balance, as is so often the case.

Boehm gives hope: there are still artists and heroes.

Souzay suffers vocal senility

The CJRT orchestra under the direction of Paul Robinson opened their current Festival Series of concerts last Sunday night with a program devoted to the music of France, featuring guest artists Gerard Souzay, baritone, and his accompanist, Dalton Baldwin. M. Souzay is undoubtedly a most distinguished musician, with an illustrious career behind him, while Mr. Baldwin is one of the world's foremost accompanists, so that Toronto is certainly fortunate to have had this opportunity of hearing them. Having said this, I must add that Paul Robinson and the orchestra deserve to claim at least an equal share of the credit for making the concert a success.

Souzay is now in his late fifties, and no longer in his vocal prime; that is, a voice that could never have been described as "opulent" or "sensibly beautiful", has now become even less so. Traditionally, as their voices begin to go, singers draw more and more upon what I believe is known in the best critical circles as "consummate musicianship", and Souzay is no exception; he shows such insight and stylishness when it comes to the French art song, the absence of gorgeous pear-shaped tones, etc., is not felt as much as it might be. Mind you, any real assessment of his present vocal condition was nipped in the bud on Sunday by the announcement that he was suffering from a throat infection but would try to sing anyway.

Under these circumstances it was very brave of him to begin the evening with the Cinq Melodies Populaires Grecques arranged by Ravel. This music, and the five Poulenc songs which followed, might be described as generally understated and subtle, with very exposed voice parts — a difficult enough way to open a concert at the best of times. Yet despite the vocal difficulties and the unlovely sound, he did succeed in evoking the unique and typically French mixture of wit and suavity which is such a fundamental part of the Poulenc songs; he was greatly aided and abetted in this by Baldwin's immaculate and sometimes virtuosic rendition of the piano parts.

The second part of the concert was given over mainly to arias with orchestra: "Air des Roses" and "Mephisto Serenade" from Berlioz' Damnation de Faust, an aria from Massenet's opera Le Jongleur de Notre Dame, and a drinking song from the opera La Jolie Fille de Perth by Bizet. Souzay seemed to be getting into his stride here, singing the Serenade and drinking song especially to great effect, and with a more attractive, less constricted voice than he had displayed earlier in the evening. In addition to the arias, the orchestra was given a chance to shine in some pops concert stuff — Ravel's own orchestration of his Pavane pour une infante defunte, and Debussy's Petite Suite as arranged by Henri Bussard.

The great surprise of the evening was the persuasive case Paul Robinson made for the Gounod Second Symphony which formed the third and final part of the program. Viewed dispassionately, this work could scarcely be described as a neglected masterpiece, being more dutiful than inspired, with a first movement modelled all too clearly after Beethoven or Haydn, a second that goes on and on and on without ever rising above the commonplace, and a fourth that seems at times to have wandered in from a nearby ballet suite.

However, Mr. Robinson's generally fast and spirited reading minimized the dullness of the conscientiously "developmental" passages, while his attention to detail ensured a performance that was almost always alive and interesting. This, combined with the great enthusiasm and generally fine ensemble of the orchestral playing, meant that more excitement was generated with the work than I would have believed possible. While I still can't agree that the piece is comparable to the more well-known Bizet Symphony, as Mr. Robinson would have it, it may be worth reviving from time to time if it is performed as well as it was on this occasion.

Anyone who wants to form his own opinion will have a chance on Sunday evening, November 13, when CJRT-FM will broadcast excerpts from the concert as part of a whole day of programming featuring French music.

The Teller's Cage is a surprisingly pleasant space isolated in the catacombs of the Commerce Court. The newest musical production to be found there, I'll Tell You Mine — If You Tell Me Yours, is easy to take, being a non-stop musical event, with clever and inconsequential lyrics directed to a waist-thickening audience. Regrettably, it is the genre of stage production that also leaves reviewers wallowing in a chaos of peppy, zany, madcap, frothy, frolicksome, bubbly, and rollicking words to describe what is generously called 'an entertainment'.

The four cast members are genuinely warm towards the audience in whose laps they are, essentially, sitting; and this seems to be the key to success with this type of production. The second key is of course the music, which is pleasant and energetic. The satire is rarely biting, being concerned with readily identifiable Toronto landmarks and besetting sins. The design of the piece has a complacent audience in mind. I'll Tell You Mine . . . is not in the tradition either of anarchic theatre nor of the theatre of mental voyaging, unless you consider a Rotary Convention spiritual travelling.

No, I wouldn't say I wasn't amused. In fact, I enjoyed the antics of the four actors immensely, and could readily admire their virtuosity of character portrayal. I think I might have enjoyed it less if I had had any preconceptions of serious art, or would have enjoyed it more had I had one more Pernod. The Teller's Cage was the tail end to a night on the town, and as such was relaxing. But unless you have money to burn, or a penchant for rhymes that would make Coward smile and W. B. Yeats blanch, go to dramatic theatre or to a truer 'cabaret'. At six dollars a shot, you owe yourself stimulation, not sedation.

Hemingway: Bringing up Papa

PAPA: A PERSONAL MEMOIR.
Gregory H. Hemingway, M. D.,
Pocket Books, $1.95.

Papa: A Personal Memoir is of great value to any students of Hemingway's works, for it is a brief account of Hemingway as seen by one of his sons, now a successful doctor. But what makes it valuable as much more than a text for scholars of the greatest representative in literature of the simple-sentences-and-consecutive-prose school of creative fiction is the insight offered in the book into what Norman Mailer in his preface calls "the sweets and sour" of love: "A characteristic of love when it is not altogether blissful is how damnably sweet and sour it gets."

The sweet is revealed in many places, particularly in Gregory Hemingway's early life with his father, before Ernest became, in his son's eyes, a snob and a social climber, when he was still the king of the literary world and "we called him Papa, not out of fear but out of love."

The pride that Hemingway takes in his 11 year old son winning a major international shooting contest over men three and four times his age, is very sweet to the boy; even the mild reproof with which he urges his son not to brag too much is sweet: "Gig, I know that when you achieve something big, you want to boast about it to everybody, but you feel like shit about it afterwards."

Sweetest of all, perhaps, is the amusement they are able to share when they read about Gig's victory in the papers, and find that he is a very modest, scrupulously religious boy who prayed before a statue of the Virgin in preparation for the shooting match and attributes to this his victory. Gig almost worships his father then and his father cares for him with devoted and gentle parental love.

The sour of love is in his growing dislike of his father when he sees him turning into a snob and a snob; in his jaundiced appraisal of Hemingway's relationships with his mother and with other women.

The sweet and sour of love is best illustrated by an anecdote from very near the end of the book which illustrates both these qualities at once.

At the time that Gregory Hemingway was eighteen, he was asked by Ernest, "Have you thought much about what you'd really like to do?"

"Actually, I had thought a lot. I'd had good grades in prep school, could get into almost any college I wanted to, and had the brains for law or medicine. But I hated most lawyers, thought they were sharpies and crooks, while medicine seemed too dull, too staid... I decided to become a writer. I make light of it now but I was dead serious then."

His father offers to help with all the experience and knowledge of craft at his command. (These are the last years of Hemingway's life, and he is not writing much himself. So he is delighted at the thought of being vicariously involved in literature again. He gives him a list of books to read, starting with the great novels, War and Peace, Madame Bovary and others, then the great short story writers, Chekov, Guy de Maupassant, and finally he says to his son, "Now try writing a short story yourself."

Soon Gregory brings back a short story which his father reads and is astonished by. "This is better than anything I ever wrote at your age," he tells Gregory, and suggests only one change. Where Gregory has written "All of a sudden," he suggests the single word "suddenly," with the remark, "You shouldn't waste words, Gig." But Ernest is very proud of the short story his son has written (as proud as he was the day Gig won the skeet-shooting championship), and encourages him to enter it in a school short story contest — which it wins.

"Turgenev should have won the prize. He wrote the story, I merely copied it, changing the setting and the names, from a book I assumed Papa hadn't read because some of the pages were still stuck together."

"I didn't feel like a winner and wondered how long it would be before Papa found out that the only creative contribution I had made to the story was to alter suddenly to 'all of a sudden.'"

Hemingway was deeply hurt by this deception. Later when asked if it were true that his son Gregory wrote, he said, "Yes, Gig's been known to write a bad cheque or two." All the bitterness of disappointed paternal love is in that remark, and the anecdote tells us a great deal not merely about the relationship of a celebrated writer with his son but of every father and son — the love and high expectancy a father may have for his son, the bitterness he may feel if that expectation is betrayed, the bitterness a child may feel when, as is inevitable, he has failed to live up to the full expectation of the father, and the angry resentment of the burden of paternal love which inevitably follows.

If we were an ordinary store, we'd sell Pioneer, Marantz, Yamaha, Sansui, etc.... Instead we've evolved into such lines as HARMAN KARDON, LUXMAN and DENON. The result: the finest equipment available on the market.

If you're seriously interested in a sound system, you don't have to go to every corner of Toronto. Within the university community is a store that offers top service, free technical advice and most important, great prices. Come down (or up) and see me in the Colonnade (131 Bloor St.). I'll be sure to help.

Thanks

movies

Friday: Lumiere begins its week with two neo-neo-realist works from the German new cinema The Lost Honour of Katharina Blum (which will teach you everything that the Varsity has forgotten about yellow journalism) and Fox and his Friends. The Roxy is offering two textbooks on sniping Targets and Black Sunday. The New Yorker eschewing beauty and beastliness for more wholesome subjects such as Kenneth Anger's moral example of what's wrong with the underground film Magick Lantern Cycle. The Revue screens The Late Show with Altman's most thorough-going turkey (even worse than Images) Nashville. The Three Schools Hitchcock program continues with Murder (1930) and U of T Films, who can take a hint have And now for Something Completely Different and Warhol-Morrissey's Frankenstein.

Saturday: Lumiere has two French dogs: Truffaut's worst film Such a Gorgeous Kid Like Me and Rohmer's most over-rated Claire's Knee. Everyone else repeats which means you ought to go drinking.

Sunday: There is never enough Godard in this city but the AGO is trying with his seldom seen Parlo Vu par... on a bill with Masculin-Feminin. Innis starts its seige of the senses with WW II propaganda cartoons at 2:00. I'd like to print the title but we'd get nasty notes from various ethnic groups. At 5:00 there's Lon Chaney's brilliant, scary, and generally deserving of all superlatives thrown at it Phantom of the Opera. While at 8:00 they let you relax with Fred Astaire and Bandwagon. Stay all day. The Revue begins three days of Fellini's disturbing version of Casanova (a must for fans of mechanical dolls and dream homes). The New Yorker stick three together for no discernible reason (maybe they're on the playlist) Shampoo, The Deep and Five Easy Pieces. The Roxy has what used to be the admission ticket to Toronto Gimme Shelter.

Monday: Lumiere exhumes one of its lesser-known goodies with L'Invitation (no maggots on this one, foax). The New Yorker has Dustin Hoffman and blood with Marathon Man and Straw Dogs.

Tuesday: The New Yorker continues its reign of terrible with Taxi Driver and Repulsion. The Science Centre gives us Gilbert and Sullivan's remarkably silly The Mikado (I'll tell you the plot but we'd get letters from those groups mentioned above).

Wednesday: As if we hadn't had a surfeit of Silent Movie the New Yorker gives it to us again. Perhaps a destroyed print of the film should be a standard item on scavenger hunt lists. They show it with Clad Blue in which Dennis Hopper proves to have even less talent than we thought he did. The Science Centre's Bulgarian films continue with Amendment to The Law. If you know anything about it come in and tell me.

Thursday: The Science Centre again delved into the obscure and come up with Bolognini's La Notte Brava, a work in the Rossellini mode. And obey obey the New Yorker emerges from the closet with a Pasolini DOUBLE BILL The Decameron and Medea.

Again it's late, the rain drips into the prison cell where Wayne Kramer sits humming I Shall Be Released. Any day now indeed. January file. We want him out and we want it now.

rock

Whether it's progressive rock, electric jazz or undisciplined tone sketching, Weather Report makes some of the most interesting music around. They'll be making one of their sadly infrequent appearances at Con. Hall on the 27th. If you've only heard their last album, be warned, their early stuff is a little more esoteric.

But that's beside the point. The real news is that Andy Williams will be playing Hamilton Place from the 7th to the 12th. Start hitch-hiking. If you can't afford to miss the classes, the New Yorker has the Vibrators and the inevitable Goddard on the bill at midnight tonight.

Everyone else coming to town in the immediate future is a simp. Murray McLaughlin and the Silver Wheelbarrow (something like that) will be at Massey Hall on Dec. 11. The Good Bros. and John Allen Cameron will be at Con. Hall on the 8th of this month (oh duddy-duddy) and Shakti and John McLaughlin will be at the Queen Elizabeth Theatre on the 9th. No word from Kim as of yet.

At the clubs, things are not looking very much brighter. Tonight the Colonial has Ramblin' Jack Elliot. The Horseshoe Tavern has Downchild, the Tube has Nightwinds (don't ask me), the Gasworks has Sweeney Todd, the El Mocambo has the National Lampoon Touring Co. and the Riverboat (I don't trust anyplace that doesn't serve beer) has Tom Chaplin.

It looks like the only act in town tonight that's worth catching is Joe Hall at the Chimney. He's a refreshingly crazy folk-blues-samba man with a reasonably competent band behind him.

Dr. John's U.C. Rectory has Liverpool in tonight.

The Art Gallery of Ontario's six week long look at the dance continues next Wed. and Thurs. Wednesday: 5:30 p.m. — Dancers at Work: Anna Pavlova, Galina Ulanova (a free film). 7 and 9 p.m. — Ulanova in Swan Lake and Giselle (2 films for $2). Also at 9 p.m. the Trisha Brown Company performs live, $3.

Thursday: 5:30 p.m. — Cine-Dance (5 free films). 7 p.m. — Merce Cunningham Walkaround Time (free film). The 9 p.m. performances are by Charlotte Hildebrand and Dancers and Ottawa's Le Groupe de la Place Royale, $3. Both days from 12 to 10 p.m., free video tapes by Matthew Speier will be shown.

Everything described above as free means there is no additional cost beyond AGO admission whereas events requiring payment exclude AGO admission. Tickets are necessary for all events; get them the day they occur from the Information Desk after noon. 317 Dundas St. West. More details at 364-0414.

It's time to look forward to The National Ballet of Canada's Fall Season at the O'Keefe Centre November 17 through November 26: Guest artists are choreographer and dancer Erk Bruhn and former National dancer Galina Samsova (1961-1964). Opening night Nov. 17 at 8 p.m. Karen Kain and Frank Augustyn team up with Bruhn in COPPELIA. Nov. 18 the same work features Vanessa Harwood, new principal Peter Schaufuss and Constantin Patsalas. The Company will also perform Ann Ditchburn's arresting Mad Shadows which was based on Marie-Claire Blais' first novel, Jerome Robbins' beautiful Afternoon of a Faun and Frederick Ashton's stunning Monotones II. In addition, The National presents Bruhn's La Sylphide and the Toronto premieres of two very different works — one classical, one contemporary. They are Marius Petipa's BAYADERKA (Act IV), and COLLECTIVE SYMPHONY which is a collective composition of The Dutch National Ballet's 3 artistic directors.

Tickets range from $4.50 to $12 for matinees and $5 to $14 for evenings. Look to this column for info. In advance; we will keep you posted but don't expect Kain-Augustyn tickets the day before. Best pickings are early. Each of the principals have built a following of faithfuls and, more generally, Toronto loves The National. Tickets are going fast. For a complete listing now call the O'Keefe Box Office at 363-6633.

No, this is not a lonely hearts column. But I'd like to find out the whereabouts of Alok Mukherjee, David Ossea, and a couple of others who wrote for the review last year. If you are out there and would still like to write, please contact me. For those new writers who have not received assignments, please be patient. Your time will come within the next two weeks.

Dying days department: Pontiac and the Green Man languishes for another two nights at the Macmillan Theatre. Call 828-5349 for reservations. Exactly nine performances remain of The Primary English Class, which is coming to resemble a revolving door as cast members come and go over its remarkably long run. Call 481-6191 for times and prices. One more week for Carol Bolt's Desperados, which is to close the 13th at Toronto Free Theatre. It has been receiving constant tinkering (needed, it is rumoured) and should now be worthwhile; plays Tuesday-Saturday at 8:30 and matinees on the weekends at 2:30; call 368-2856.

Opening: at Hart House, previews of The Dismissal tonight and tomorrow night at 8:30, opening officially Monday same time. Call 978-8668 for reservations, $2.50 preview, $3 regular run. Also recently underway are Theatre Second Floor's revival of Jeckyll play Hyde (at 86 Parliament); all tickets one dollar, call 364-4025 for reservations Wednesday to Sunday. At the O'Keefe, Jesus Christ Superstar has his second coming early for the benefit of wealthy theatre-goers; $4.50 and up, tonight at 8:30, tomorrow 6:30 and 9:30, Sunday 3 and 7 p.m. A new Gothic adapted by George F. Walker at Toronto Free Theatre Upstairs, Zastrozzi (The Master of Discipline) which promises to be ah, interesting. Performances Tuesday to Saturday at 8:00, weekend matinees at 2:00; call 368-7601.

Back to the O'Keefe: when JC is translated into final gate receipts, My Fair Lady enters the Front St. Barn for a split run. All next week, evenings at 8:30 or matinees, cheaper, Wednesday and Saturday at 2:00. At the St. Paul's Centre, 121 Avenue Road, Theatre du P'tit Bonheur presents Irma La Douce, opening next week. Tuesdays to Saturdays at 8:30, and Sunday matinee at 3:00. Student tickets $3 weekdays, $4 weekends. Call 466-8400. And the same night, Schubert's Cabaret, tucked into the basement lounge of the Avenue Park Hotel, 138 Pines Avenue, replaces Piaf with Marlene, set in a Berlin cabaret on New Year's Eve 1932. Over forty songs will be presented in that lavish and slightly decadent atmosphere. Prices are high: $5 Monday to Thursday, a dollar more Friday and Saturday. Call 961-2460. Next Wednesday Peter Handke's Kaspar opens at the Cafe Soho, 334 Queen St. West. A fascinating play, it is a worthwhile and difficult vehicle for Jack Wetherall. Performances Tuesdays to Saturdays at 8:30, $3.50-$5, with a PWYC matinee Sunday at 2:00; call Theatre Passe Muraille to reserve at 363-8988.

Off in the far distance, two interesting productions: At the Fairview Library Theatre, Don Mills and Shepherd, Tennessee Williams' Summer and Smoke. Apparently Stage Centre Productions, new organization, has sold over 1,100 subscriptions, and that is newsworthy any time. Call 497-2482 for further revelations. Nearer to home, Ayckbourn's Relatively Speaking continues under Toronto Truck Theatre's guidance at the Colonnade until the 20th (call 922-0084 for information).

At Innis College, 6 p.m. Saturday, a presentation of Jagannath, Lord of the World, a drama about a luckless and landless Bengali peasant who is eventually hung on a treason charge. Mostly in mime, accompanied by English narration. At the St. Lawrence, an entertaining The Shoemaker's Holiday at 8:00 p.m. weeknights, Saturdays at 2:00 and 8:00; call 366-4734 for pricing details. At Tarragon, The Dream Play continues, Tuesdays to Sundays, at 8:30, Sunday matinee at 2:30 (PWYC); call 531-1827. Les Canadiens score again this week at Toronto Workshop, 8:30 except for Sunday matinee at 2:30; call 925-8640. And a dramatic reading of Arnold Wesker's new play, The Merchant, inspired by Shakespeare's The Merchant of Venice, to be presented in the sanctuary of Beth Habonim on Nov. 6 at 8:00 p.m., 12 Hollaman Rd., (Bathurst and Glencairn).

Tonight in St. James Cathedral Steven Stark — probably Canada's No. 1 violinist — plays in a concert of English music with the New Chamber Orchestra. Time 8:30, tickets $6.50. Also at 8:30, Northstar continues its Mozart Festival with a program of assorted wind pieces in Castle Frank High School. Tickets $4.50.

Tomorrow evening in Metropolitan United Church the house orchestra and choir give a concert of Mozart and Haydn. 8:00; $2, $3, $5.

Peter Frankl, a very extensively recorded Hungarian-British pianist, offers a recital in Walter Hall Sunday at 4:00. Program includes Beethoven Op. 57 and Mozart C minor Fantasy; student tickets $3.00. Definitely worth hearing.

Monday in York's Burton Auditorium, the Grupo de Accion Instrumental de Buenos Aires will present "music-theatre satires" on Satie and Wagner. Suitable for people who know these composers. Starts 7:30, students $3.50. Cheaper and closer is an all-Bach organ recital by Charles Peaker in Convocation Hall. Starts at five; $1 at the door.

The Massey Hall concert this week features pianist Martha Argerich in Mozart's Concerto No. 25. Davis conducts Schumann's Fourth Symphony as well. Tuesday and Wednesday at 8:30, $2 rush seats at 7:00.

Wednesday at 12:15 Leslie Kinton and James Anagnoson plays a free four-hands piano concert at the Conservatory of Music Concert Hall. That evening at 8:30 and also free, the U of T Wind Symphony presents its first concert of the year. MacMillan Theatre; program includes transcriptions of Wagner, Copland, and Ravel.

Two major events start at 8:30 Thursday evening. In Massey Hall, Chilean pianist Claudio Arrau plays a recital including Beethoven's Op. 109 and the Liszt B minor (how can you leave it alone?). Tickets start at $4.50. In the St. Lawrence Centre Town Hall, the Suk Trio offer a program including Beethoven's Op. 97. Some seats available at 8:00.

Hello Jazz Fans! I've recently received a report from Alfred Page and Anne that Frank Rosolino was terribly disappointing — bad jokes, short solos, etc. — I guess he's deteriorated over the years.

Eddie 'Cleanhead' Vinson plays alto and sings until Saturday at Bourbon St., followed on Monday by Chet Baker (trumpet) for a two week stint. Baker's improvisations have a logic and form which is as impressive as his gripping attack.

At George's, the Rob McConnell Quintet (trombone) finishes off the week with the Gary Binstead Quartet (bass) taking over next week.

Budd Johnson continues to blow his trumpet at DJ's Tavern tonight and tomorrow. On Monday the club introduces its first vocalist, Ernestine Anderson, described in the fifties, as "one of the freshest new voices in jazz".

Tuesday, Nov. 8 at the Museum features the Bruce Casady Quartet (trumpet) at 5:30 p.m.

On Wednesday at noon, the Eugene Amaro Quartet (sax and flute) will offer Hart House listeners a chance to hear some first rate extemporization.

The Colonial Tavern brings in jazz giant Diz Gillespie for a week starting Monday. Diz is one of the prime formative influences behind almost all modern trumpeters — don't miss him.

art

Redinger opens a show of New Works at the Isaac's Gallery — striped sculptural pieces. Till Nov. 19. In the same experimental genre is Gerald Ferguson a Halifax artist whose exhibition of Paintings continues at the AGO till December 31.

The Big O. has a large exhibition of British watercolours produced between 1730 and 1880, and includes works by Blake and J.W.M. Turner. Till Dec. 11. If you prefer 'art canadien' Toronto's AGO has Canadian paintings from various U of T collections, some rarely seen before. Till Nov. 20.

David Mirvish Gallery has refreshed its walls with new shows — one of photography by Carol Marino and recent paintings by Daniel Solomon. Gallery Moos also changes feet with a new multi-media show by Karel Appel. Till Nov. 24. Next door at the Gadatsy Gallery, Peter Flinck's drawings take us "Around the Body," till Nov. 25.

On a return trip to the Big O, catch Another Dimension at the National Gallery, with sculptures by Michael Snow, Norman White, our friend Jan Carr-Harris, and Murray Favro, till December 11. And back at the AGO, The Drawings of Henry Moore includes 261 works dating from 1921 to the present. Didn't know he could draw eh? The big Ambrase Volland — Impresario show continues till Dec. 4. Well worth seeing.

George Hawken's drawing "Tumbling Mummy" in a series of new drawings at the Aggregation Gallery till Nov. 10. Will Ogilvie at the Roberts Gallery and James Gordaneer at the Merton Gallery also have good shows, till Nov. 12.

Final stop at the Albert White Gallery for original hand pulled prints by Richard Sewell. The technique is far superior to the result.

Homosexuals seek protection under law

By SEAN DUNPHY

The gay liberation movement will liberate all sectors of society by granting "freedom from the grisly demands of being men or being women" according to Gerald Hannon, co-editor of the gay newspaper Body Politic. Hannon was speaking to the resolution "that the rights of homosexuals should be protected by law" in a Hart House Debate on Wednesday night.

Hannon said that the gay rights cause has been making progress, pointing to ordinances passed by Toronto, Ottawa and Windsor banning discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation and similar resolutions passed by the Federal and Ontario wing of the New Democratic Party.

Hannon said the goal of the gay liberation movement is a society with "complete and absolute equality of homosexuality and heterosexuality." He described a society in which there would be no families as we know them, because the traditional heterosexual marriage is a "machine for the production of heterosexuals." He pointed out that quite contrary to Anita Bryant's assertion that homosexuality is not natural, bird populations on the Pacific coast have been observed forming homosexual pairings, and some researchers have reported observing incidences of homosexual rape among earthworms.

GAYS SINGLED OUT

Debaters questioned the advisability of enshrining gay rights specifically in the law, since gays would be singled out and given special status. The government cannot legislate attitudes.

Ruth Wehlau of the School of Graduate Studies replied that homosexuals need special help from the law in overcoming individual biases, and that the intent of such a law would not be to grant gays special status or to "set up reservations" for them.

Another speaker, Ian Turner, said that homosexuals need legal protection, as they are presently being discriminated against by the law. He pointed to the frequent denial by the courts of child custody to a homosexual parent, OHIP discrimination against gays by refusing to grant gay couples family status, and the case of John Damien who was recently fired from his job with the Jockey Association because he was a homosexual.

The vote by those present at the debate was 33 to 17 in favor of the resolution.

Speaker of the house during gay debate Peter Neilson.

OCUFA tells Davis education quality on cutting board

By KEN WHITEHURST

"The interests of students are being overlooked in the current mood of severe cutbacks in government spending by Queen's Park. We have reached the stage where educational quality is now on the cutting board," warned Paul Cassano, Ontario Confederation of University Faculty Associations' (OCUFA) chairman, in a statement released before a meeting between OCUFA delegates and Premier William Davis on Monday.

OCUFA represents about 10,000 university teachers in Ontario.

In that Monday meeting, the premier warned that money for universities may be in short supply in the next fiscal year.

Davis sought to assure the OCUFA representatives that he wants to protect the quality of the programs in all Ontario universities no matter what their size or location, because he wants to ensure equality of education and student accessibility across the province.

OCUFA is concerned that provincial spending cuts will limit francophone students' ability to attend Ontario universities. They believe that a contraction of the university system forces francophone needs down on the budget list and, consequently, denies these students accessibility to Ontario's universities.

Blues Look Sharp: Rout Mustangs 8-0

By HUGH STUART

The Varsity Hockey Blues greeted the visiting Western Mustangs with a five goal first period barrage and never looked back in recording an impressive 8-0 victory in a non conference game on Wednesday. While the victory will not count in the standings, it was undoubtedly a satisfying victory for coach Tom Watt's squad.

A power play goal by former Marlboro star Cary Farelli, got the ball rolling as he slapped the rebound of a Dan D'Alvise shot past Western goalie Cam Fink. Shortly afterward Frank Davis gave the Blues a 2-0 lead when he converted Ron Harris' centering pass into a score.

A penalty slowed down the barrage for a short while but at even strength, captain Larry Hopkins gave the Blues a three goal lead. Later in the period, Harris did some excellent corner work in setting up Doug Herridge in the slot for the Blues' fourth goal.

Alex Jeans almost made the score 5-0 when he broke in alone, only to be hauled down by a Western defender. The Blues' best chance during the ensuing power play came on a shot by veteran Rocci Pagnello, but Fink was equal to the task. However, it was a defenceman that finished off the first period scoring as Rob Gemmell beat the Western netminder cleanly with a rising slapshot from ten feet inside the blue line.

The second period featured a similar pattern of play as the Blues continued to buzz around the visitors' net. Good goaltending, including a pair of fine saves on Doug Caines and Jeans, kept Toronto off of the scoreboard until midway through the period. Then the Blues erupted for two goals within thirty seconds. Herridge's shot from the point deflected off a Western defenceman for the first goal. The second came when Caines finally connected after Dan Tsubouchi found him in the slot with a pass making the score at the end of the second period 7-0.

The third period degenerated into a display of chippy hockey interspersed with some fine goaltending from Fink. Defenceman Wayne Morrissey's unassisted backhand goal was the only tally of the period. The Blues loosened up defensively during the last ten minutes and Jenner was forced to make some good save to preserve his shut-out. He also was aided by the poor finishing of the visitors who hit two goalposts and a crossbar.

Watt's familiarity with European strategy was in evidence on Wednesday as he went with units of five players instead of the traditional different couplings of forward lines and defensive pairs. This was made possible by the fact that Watt has the luxury of having three strong defensive pairs to be matched with his three forward lines.

The object of such a strategy is to get the defencemen more involved in the attack. Obviously the strategy worked, not only in terms of total goals scored, but also in the fact that the Blues' attack was a well balanced one.

Harris led the assists parade with three. D'Alvise who centered the potent pair of Farelli and Hopkins had two while forwards Davis, Caines, Tsubouchi and Jeans, and defencemen Charlie Hughes, Joe Grant, Brad Tamblin, Morrissey and Pagnello each had single assists.

The Blues served warning to the rest of the league that they won't back down from the rough stuff. Harris, Caines and Gemmell adopted the enforcer role becoming involved in various skirmishes. The home team also dishd out some heavy hits, particularly blueliners Pagnello and Tamblin.

Cary Farelli has no trouble putting the puck into the vacant Western net as Larry Hopkins watches.

All things considered, the key to the victory had to be the Blues' ability to finish off their scoring thrusts. As Watt explained after the game, "Against York (a 4-3 loss last weekend) I thought that we played very well but we simply weren't finishing off our plays. Tonight we did and that's the difference."

The next visitors are Billy Harris' Laurentian University team and past history indicates that the visitors should be a very stubborn team. (Varsity Arena tonight, 8:00)

Blue lines — Unofficially there were 157 fans in the 5,200 seat Varsity Arena on Wednesday. That's a lot of empty seats and the sound that the Engineering Band members made sure did echo. Spare the eardrums of the regular fans and go to the game on Friday. C'mon. It's only a buck.

St. Mike's, Dents, New, Advance to Mullock Cup

By JIM O'LEARY

Engineering collapsed in the fourth quarter, allowing St. Mike's to overcome a 13 point deficit and win the right to meet Scarborough in the Division I Interfaculty Football Championship. In a game played on the back campus Wednesday, St. Mike's scored 14 points in the last seven minutes of the game to win 14-13.

The loss brought to mind games of several years ago when the then powerhouse Engineers faltered and loss to underdog teams from The Faculty of Medicine. In one of these games the Meds came from behind to beat the Engineers 36-32, despite playing with only 15 players.

Wednesday's loss also marked the second time this year the Engineers squandered fourth quarter leads and lost to St. Mike's. Two weeks ago St. Mike's rallied late to defeat the Engineers 16-13.

The Engineers took a 13-0 lead on a first half touchdown by John Skypke and seven points from the toe of place kicker Intorino. With only seven minutes left in the game it seemed that the engineers would be able to hang on for the win.

St. Mike's finally got their offence going, however, as quarterback John Leon led the team downfield for their first major. T. J. Flynn scored the touchdown and Leon kicked the convert to narrow the count to 13-6.

St. Mike's came right back and took the lead on a touchdown by Mike Trudeal. Once again the convert was made, moving St. Mike's into a 14-13 lead.

With only a minute left in the game and St. Mike's with possession of the ball at midfield, it looked as if the game was wrapped up when a fumble almost turned the game around. The engineers recovered and promptly moved into scoring position on the strength of their passing game.

With first and goal the engineers were in perfect position to try two running plays, setting up what would have been the game winning field goal. Instead the engineers elected to pass and had their season go down the drain when the ball was intercepted in the endzone.

St. Mike's victory means they will meet undefeated Scarborough for the Division 1 championship. The game will be played on the back campus next Thursday at 2:30.

UC and Trinity Upset in Division 11

By JIM O'LEARY

It will be New College and Dentistry in the Division II championship to be played on the Back Campus next Thursday at 12:00. The finalists were decided by the outcome of games played Thursday afternoon.

In the first game, New needed a last minute field goal to get past a determined Trinity team 9-6. Underdog Dentistry demolished the first place finishing University College (UC) 25-0 in the second game.

Against Trinity, New scored first on a 16 yard run by B. Colm. The touchdown drive, which covered 60 yards, was aided by a couple of untimely Trinity penalties. The point after attempt was blocked making the score 6-0 at the end of the half.

There was no scoring in the third quarter as both teams played a conservative defensive type of game.

In the fourth quarter Trinity tied the game when L. Marten capped a long drive with a six yard touchdown run, with only two minutes left in the game. The touchdown tied the game, setting up what could have been a game winning convert. With the pressure on, New applied a strong rush and blocked the kick.

With two minutes left in the game overtime seemed a likely possibility when New received the snuising kickoff. The New offence came to life however and marched 77 yards to set up the tie breaking 21 yard field goal by Craig Muir.

In the Dents-UC game, the winning point was scored on the opening kickoff. Dents' Mark Smith boomed the kickoff 75 yards through the endzone for a single.

Dents plowed to the rest of their points behind a strong running game. Steve Joynt, Steve Brooks and Walter Vogl proved to be too much for the UC defence to handle.

The runners moved Dents into a 19-0 half time lead. Joynt scored the first touchdown of the game on a spectacular 55 yard run. The second major was scored by fullback Vogl on a tough two yard run up the middle.

The runners continually gave Dents excellent field positions which allowed Smith to kick two field goals.

In the second half, the Dents ground game continued to chew up the yardage and eat up the clock. The hard running of Vogl was particularly prominent.

Dents' last touchdown came on a five yard run by the speedy Joynt. The play capped a 65 yard march.

Women squashers lose

By REGINA HICKL-SZABO

The U of T Women's Squash Team competed in a tournament on Tues., Nov. 1, at Valhall 11, in Islington. Though Toronto lost the majority of the games played there were a number of significant victories.

Star player Portia Legatt a former member of the Queen's University team, won three of four games. Her scores were: 5-9, 9-2, 9-1 and 9-5. Legatt said U of T's opponents were good. "They seemed to have had much more practice in competition than we have." Once again, lack of experience under pressure seemed to be the common complaint.

Gaylene Pron played a series of games which she felt were "just not up to par". Her scores were 9-3, 9-5 and 9-4. When asked what her opponent's strength was, Pron replied: "she was a good player — very court-wise and experienced". "Portia's game was a good fight all the way!" Pron commented.

Anna Muszynski, who only took up squash in January of '77, played what must have been three wild games. "I was absolutely dead. For me the match was a blur but it was good experience". Muszynski added that she was out of position too often, and that she didn't use the court to its fullest potential.

The Women's Squash Team is continuing practising hard. It is making definite improvements in the areas of positioning on the court, and strokes.

The next tournament will take place on Mon. Nov. 7, at Markham 1. See you there!

Enrolment drop likely

By BRIGITTE MERTLING

Dropping enrolment figures could seriously affect U of T's budget if the preliminary statistics to be released later this month confirm expectations.

A report is presently being compiled by the Office of Student Records Services (SRS) to be submitted to the government by December 20th. According to J. M. Tusiewicz, Director of SRS, there are about 1,000 fewer students this year. However, this year's enrolment figures are only "a bit short of the expected target," he stated.

Although there may be a general drop, the areas likely to be hardest hit are the Faculty of Education, Scarborough College, and the Woodsworth part-time arts and science program.

U of T administrators have suggested a number of reasons for the probable enrolment drop. The trend seems to be toward less full-time study and more part-time study, and this "must reflect a desire on the part of a lot more students to earn money part-time," said K. R. Thompson, Acting Registrar for Victoria College. This situation, when viewed together with a dropping off of Grade 13 applicants and increased enrolment in the community Colleges of Applied Arts and Technology (CAAT), is "what one might expect in the current economic circumstances," according to U of T president John Evans. Evans stated that job anxiety is responsible for the significant number of students not returning to school to complete their degrees, and that "if economic and employment conditions continue with the predictions, enrolment will level off or drop in Arts and Science." This in turn, he said, will increase the pressure on the professional faculties which have good job opportunities.

Director of Admissions William Kent confirmed the fact that there has not been a drop in the actual number of admissions, only in the number of applicants, a province-wide trend. This means that instead of having four applicants per position, there are now only two or three.

So how will all this affect Joe Student in the long run? Evans expressed the hope that "the government will recognize that universities have been inadequately funded the last three to four years due to restraints." As a result, "they would accept the last three to four years as a period of overpopulation and maintain their present support." However, he also expressed the possibility of significant cut-backs on the part of the provincial government.

The first indications of the direction taken by the provincial government on their controversial student aid proposals since Minister of Colleges and Education Harry Parrott's regional hearings of a month ago were outlined in a memorandum from Ontario Director of Student Awards Bill Clarkson.

The document, dated October 13, contains information being made public by the Ministry of Colleges and Universities for the first time. The information confirms earlier Ministry statements on the Ontario Student Assistance Program (OSAP) answers some questions about the related grant plan (OSGP) but leaves other items still in the dark. The official plan, according to the brief, will be disclosed on January 1, 1978.

The memo states that the Ministry will continue to push for loan repayment to begin 6 months after a student begins working rather than 6 months after graduation. A meeting between the Ministry and the Special Loans Committee of the Canadian Bankers Association will take place in November to discuss the "possibility of changes to repayment terms on loans (as requested by students)."

Another concession in the brief reveals that grant eligibility periods will not apply either to part-time students who don't apply for grant assistance or to full-time members of the work force taking courses "on their own time." Thus, students in these cases will not use up their eligibility periods.

Students who live away from home during their university years will also get a break according to the document. Parrott has agreed to distinguish between an "at home" and an "away" rate for board and lodging in the grant plan. Furthermore, the memo states, applicants whose parents have refused to sign the tax waiver for the application will have access to the appeals procedure, a reversal from the earlier public position of no parental signature, no grant.

The procedure for study term earnings under OSGP will revert to last year's OSAP stricture of a $500 exemption per term and a 50 per cent deduction of the remainder from the grant. Nor will students be penalized for owning a car as they were under the old plan the document states.

While no decision was made on the "grandfather clause" of the public proposals (which denied students in graduate and professional programs grant eligibility), four options were arrived at from "the input the Minister got from his recent meetings with students." They include increasing the grant periods from four to five years, providing eligibility for two years and starting all applicants off on the same foot by creating eight grant periods (or four years).

The document also outlined the formula by which students' summer earnings will be calculated for a grant: total gross earnings less the allowance for board and lodging will be divided by two for the student's contribution.

A second memorandum from Student Assistance Planner John Bonner to the Ministry's Implementation Committee reveals the process by which applicants', their parents or their spouses' assets will be considered. The "click-in point" above which applicants will be ineligible for grants has not been established, but the figures of $100,000 for parents and $3,500 for students are mentioned. Assets will, however, include real estate, investments and "cash on hand and in the bank" according to Clarkson's brief.

The document released by Clarkson states that the restrictive criteria for the Ontario Special Bursary Plan (for part-time students) will "remain essentially the same in 1978-79." One area which the memo doesn't clarify is the point at which parental contributions to OSGP are expected. The document doesn't provide a scale for parental contributions; thus the recipients of grants and the proportion of them remains a mystery.

Groups protest Nazi Newsreels, slam films for promoting fascism

The promotional leaflet put out by Regus Films says "You will see crowds of people welcoming and cheering Hitler's troops as they liberate the Rhineland and Austria; you will see pre-Hitler Germany with its breadlines, prostitution, riots and social unrest contrasted with the order and vitality of the Nazi regime and you will begin to understand why the German people and their neighbors willingly donned the yoke of National Socialism."

The leaflet advertises a program of four films at Innis College Town Hall. The program, entitled The Nazi Newsreels of Joseph Goebbels, was screened for the first time on November 1. Further screenings will take place on November 8 and 15.

Reg Hartl, president of Regus Films, says that his aim in showing the films is to demonstrate how effective and misleading news services can be. He claims the films will warn people of the danger of following leaders on "blind faith."

A number of groups and individuals on campus, however, feel that the nature of the advertising promotes fascism. A petition initiated by the Trotskyist League (U of T club) and signed by over 30 groups and individuals has been circulated around campus. In addition, a picket in front of Innis College is planned for Tuesday's screening.

Hartl's reaction is: "Let them do it. If I feel that these films are being used to promote a fascist extreme then I will stop the films. I don't need help from anyone to reach that decision." He says it never occurred to him that the promotion leaflet could be misleading. He admitted, however, that he received a lot of complaints and has consequently written a new leaflet.

As evidence of his political neutrality Hartl cites his inclusion of Alain Resnais short film Night and Fog (a film that depicts the Nazi horrors) at the first screening of "Nazi Newsreels." He says he has followed this practice of including anti-fascist films in programs of Nazi films ever since members of the Western Guard attended a showing of Leni Riefenstahl's Triumph of the Will.

Informed of Hartl's explanation, Dorothy Lewanski of the Trotskyist League said a protest would still be valid. "The leaflet," she said, "is the only thing people have seen." She pointed out that the leaflet does not mention that anti-fascist films are being shown together with the Nazi films. The build-up for the films, she feels, counts for more than Hartl's profession of good faith.

FLASH!!

By ANDY HUGHES
on the scene

Demonstrators against the horrors of the movie "Snuff" shown at Cinema 2000 continued to obstruct the running of the film Sunday night.

As of press time last night more than 2,000 people from all walks of life joined members of the organization Women Against Violence Against Women, WAVAW, the initiators of the protest Saturday night. They had temporarily shut down the theatre, however, the film continued to be run after they left Sunday.

When asked about the reopening of the theatre a Metro policeman blatantly said: "Yes, it's a business just like any other . . . they can't make money if they're not open, can they?"

A policeman on the scene was questioned as to whether he felt City Council would do anything about the movie. "I really don't know what's going to become of it," he said. "After all, it's only a movie," he continued.

A WAVAW spokeswoman stated, "we'll just keep on demonstrating until something happens." "All we want is to have this movie stopped and to thoroughly clean up Yonge St. by stopping violence against women," she said.

The University of Toronto Cross Country Team defeated the best runners in the country to win the Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union (CIAU) cross country championship at Queen's University on Saturday.

Toronto dominated the field with their five counting members finishing in the top ten. This gave Toronto a 32 point spread over the second place finishers from the University of Alberta.

Paul Williams, from the University of Guelph, won the race in a time of 36 minutes, 18 seconds over a distance of slightly more than the expected 10 kilometres. Williams' performance could lead him to a berth on the National Cross Country team which will be competing in Scotland next year.

Brad Morley, who has been a consistent track and cross country performer at the U of T for the last five years, leaves intercollegiate competition with a commendable second place finish in the race and five CIAU cross country titles to his credit.

Paul Craig, a 1,500 metre semi-finalist at the Montreal Olympics and holder of the Senior Canadian 1,500 metre record, finished fifth. Craig comes to Toronto after four successful years at the University of Texas.

Terry Goodenough finished eighth which is not surprising considering he is the Canadian high school record holder for the 1,500 metres. Both Craig and Goodenough are in contention for berths on the Canadian team which will compete in the Commonwealth Games in Edmonton next July.

Phil St. Louis, Andy Reed and John Ptolemy finished ninth, tenth and thirteenth respectively. All three are provincially ranked middle distance runners.

U of T is now preparing for the indoor track and field championships this February.

Future energy

By SELWYN FIRTH

The major problem facing Ontario's energy future is the long lead time required to build generating stations. Such was the consensus of the participants in the Sesquicentennial Energy Symposium held Tuesday night at the Medical Sciences Building.

Dr. Arthur Porter, Chairman of the Royal Commission on Electrical Power Planning said his commission's purpose was to examine energy plans and make suggestions, but not, he emphasized, to formulate policies for the future. He stated that the future depended on immediate decisions and that delays now could mean energy shortages by the mid 1980's.

A number of other problems were delineated in the field of energy production by panel members. P. G. Campbell, Vice-President of Ontario Hydro, cited the high cost. One of the greatest expenses lies in making the generating station reliable, he said. He questioned whether the country could afford to reduce the cost of producing energy by reducing its reliability.

Dr. Kenneth Hare of the Institute for Environmental Studies enlightened the audience with the fact that there would be problems no matter which route is taken. If we were able to derive all our energy requirements from oil and gas, we would end up with an atmosphere containing enough carbon dioxide to allow the average mean temperature all over the earth to rise from one to six degrees centigrade over the next 25 years, related Hare. The results would be "catastrophic," he said. On the other hand, if we minimize the use of the fossil fuels and use nuclear reactors we will have to deal with the radioactive waste products, he warned.

The energy outlook is not bleak but if vital decisions are not made now, the delays could prove costly by the 1990's, the panel concluded.

14 hopefuls for each spot in law

By CHARLES MEISTER

Acceptance to law school is the major hurdle for an aspiring lawyer, Arnold Weinrib stated at the Career Counselling and Placement Centre "Careertalk" on Law. Weinrib, a U of T law professor and a member of the Admissions Committee of the Faculty of Law, revealed to about 100 students last Friday that U of T last year received 2,800 applications for 600 places and that there were approximately 15,000 applications for the 1,100 places in all Ontario.

Weinrib advised that it is wise to apply to several universities and that there are no specifically relevant undergraduate courses necessary for law school.

He designated the student's previous academic record as the crucial criterion for admission review. The university attended by the student and the courses he has taken are also important factors. Weinrib termed this "academic strength of the program."

The committee, he pointed out, is also looking for the student's academic potential. He has improved his standing over his undergraduate years, each year is taken into account separately, he stated. He allowed that extraneous circumstances will be considered in special situations of a personal or other nature. A student's academic record is usually given more weight than his LSAT score (Law School Entrance Exam) — an 80 per cent average is a healthy acceptance mark but not an absolute cut-off point. Although a comparative process, the standards for admission have not descended in the last ten years according to Weinrib.

The second criterion is the student's LSAT results. Weinrib commented that no score can guarantee admission but that a mark over 600 is usually necessary. The LSAT may be written more than once without penalty. "You have absolutely nothing to lose," said

Weinrib. Providing a reasonable academic record has been achieved, a score placed in the top 15 per cent of all candidates usually assures admission. Weinrib viewed the best preparation as a good night's sleep in order to be alert for this often laborious exam.

Law school involves three years of study and according to Weinrib is generally a little more difficult than undergraduate work. Courses are prescribed in the first year; then the student has a free and wide choice of courses. Different systems of teaching also exist, he pointed out. Exams are held at the year's end at U of T whereas York's Osgoode Hall operates upon a semester system. Weinrib believes asking someone in law school about it is the best method for arriving at an ultimately "gut decision." He further noted that though there may be a difference in professors in law schools in Ontario, their basic philosophies do not conflict.

February is the deadline to apply to U of T's Faculty of Law and the LSAT may be written as late as April. Students must be at least in second year before applying Weinrib said. If applicants feel they have other attributes salient to admission they can submit an explanatory letter.

Toronto lawyer Barbara Betcherman stated that there is a "glut in the market" of lawyers. There are 8,000 lawyers in Toronto, 14,000 in the province and the educational system is producing them at the rate of 1,000 each year, she revealed. She felt, however, that in this economic period lawyers are better off than most other professionals. In the last 10 years lawyers have done well and there has been an "assumption of prosperity." Betcherman believes law has a lot to offer financially if one is an "individualist" because

Cookies for nutrition

By RHONDA TEPPER

A revolutionary cookie composed of soy and milk protein that will allow Canadian snackers to satisfy their sweet tooth while gaining substantial protein was one of many nutritional trends discussed at a "Nutrition Toronto" symposium held Saturday by the U of T Sesqui-centennial Committee.

Over 500 people filled the Medical Sciences Auditorium for the symposium under Chairperson Barbara Floyd. She welcomed the participants, who had come from Charlottetown, P.E.I., California, and Yellowknife, and included educators, dietitians, mental health specialists and researchers in cancer and heart disease.

George Beaton, Dean of the Faculty of Food Sciences, extended a welcome and outlined the aims of the food science program at U of T.

Valerie McGuire, a dietitian from St. Michael's Hospital, gave a short lecture on the Lipid Research Program, talking about cardiovascular disease and atherosclerosis (hardening of the arteries) which is caused by accumulation of cholesterol. Unlike normal fat, she said, cholesterol is much harder to control since it is contained in protein foods like eggs and meat. Death by heart attack is more common in men but there has been a slight increase in women, she revealed. The three major risk factors of heart disease are hypertension, cholesterol, and smoking. She also cited obesity, diabetes, and genetic factors.

McGuire told the audience that the Lipid Research Program had determined that females should reduce their caloric intake between the ages of 15 and 25 from about 2,000 to 1,500 calories per day. Men should also reduce caloric intake as they get older, but not until the age of about 25, since the pubertal growth period of males is more extensive and rapid than that of females, research has revealed.

William Bruce of the Department of Medical Biophysics talked about nutrition and cancer research. He claimed that diet is more of a risk factor for cancer in women, and tobacco more of a risk factor for cancer in men. Colon cancer was extremely common in women who ate an abundance of meat, according to a graph displaying data from several countries in which meat was a major element of the diet. For example, New Zealand, where meat is eaten quite frequently, has the highest rate of colon cancer.

During the morning session, the "People Cookie", a product recently developed by the Christie Brown and Company was introduced. Several eaten throughout the day may replace other sources of daily protein, the company said; they promoted the cookie as inexpensive, and suitable for young babies or the elderly. The cookie was released in Ontario in September of this year and tastes similar to digestive biscuits.

The symposium continued with lectures about breast-feeding and vitamin C therapy. In the afternoon food consumption trends in Toronto were explored by Harvey Anderson from U of T's Dept. of Nutrition and Food Science. A panel, comprising representatives from industry, government and the university discussed ideas and trends in nutrition among the population, as well as consumer habits.

Line-up for booksale

By LEON KING

It pays to advertise. An estimated 15,000 people came to the Graduate Student Union (GSU) building Saturday to shop for bargain books priced at a dollar or less in the U of T Bookstores' Sesqui Sale.

People lined up at the west side doors as early as 7 a.m. to be the first to find book bargains. By 9 a.m. the line stretched from the GSU along Bancroft Street and onto Huron Street. At 11 a.m., after thousands of people had entered, the line was longer than it had been before.

Surprisingly, a large number of the early birds were science or engineering students hoping to get a good buy on otherwise overly expensive items to supplement their course studies. Others, veterans of many sales, were simply book lovers out on a spree.

Ken Totten and David Finley together spent $85 at the sale, and estimate the worth of what they bought at over 500 dollars. People who had arrived early at the sale were observed to lurch away with two or three bags, looking exhausted but satisfied. Said Mary Ann Cross, "I got here earlier than I would for lectures!"

Dennis Ostroff had come in search of books in mathematics and engineering. He didn't find much of what he was looking for, but came away with a load of history, management science and electrical engineering tomes. He thought the sale "was a good idea, but crappily organized." There were just too many people in the room at one time to allow for breathing space, he complained. As for strategy: "Well, I tried to be polite, but it's difficult to know what you're doing when you see a good book."

U of T Bookstores' general manager John Taylor was quite surprised at the large number of people. Optimistically he hopes that the Bookstore will reap a profit of $20,000 after expenses to help offset last year's $70,000 deficit.

Certain books went quickly, especially the art books. Others, such as Caesar's account of the Gallic Wars in Latin and English will probably outlast the sale which ends next Saturday at 6 p.m. But there were bargains everywhere, providing one arrived early enough.

The advertised value of the books ranged from $2.00 to $67.50. The cheapest book appeared to be Jamaica in Maps, by C. G. Clarke and A. G. Hodgkins, University of London Press, at 25 cents. And the $67.50 book which sold for a dollar was Atomic Dynamics in Liquids by N. H. March and M. P. Tosi, MacMillan Press, 1976.

Horrors of "Snuff" attacked

By ANDY HUGHES
on the scene

A dozen women and a handful of men marched down Yonge Street Saturday night for the purpose of destroying the footage of a film. The movie entitled "Snuff" making its Canadian debut at Cinema 2000, depicts the slow mutilation of a woman said to have actually occurred.

At a meeting of an organization called Women Against Violence Against Women (WAVAW) on Saturday, action against Cinema 2000 was discussed. The group decided that those interested should take action after a separate demonstration planned by WAVAW against violence, so as to disassociate WAVAW from this protest.

Consequently, approximately 20 men and women poured en masse into the cinema, just after 9 p.m. fighting police and theatre employees in their attempts to gain entrance. They immediately smashed the screen projector and staged a sit-in inside the auditorium. 10 minutes later Metro police arrived and arrested persons who refused to leave the theatre.

Outside, the demonstrators and spectators escalated to 2,000 while police stood arm in arm in an attempt to control the crowd. A woman threw a brick at the theatre sparking the people to start a chant of "Snuff out Snuff . . . snuff out Snuff." A girl was arrested for walking across the road at the crosswalk, and charged with "disturbing the peace."

By this time, the movie house had closed and its occupants had fled by way of the rear exit doors, but outside a woman who called herself

Protesters outside Cinema 2000 on Yonge St. Saturday night.

"Everywoman" was speaking through a megaphone to the crowd: "You know, a woman is used in the film in there, and she is cut up piece by piece . . . and it's a real woman, or it was! They cut open her stomach and cut off her fingers, and she's alive . . . or she was!"

According to "Everywoman," the woman used in the film was a South American who was lured into the production and then butchered.

The killing scene apparently had been cut and substituted with footage known to have been staged, but the principle of the atrocity still remains the same according to a WAVAW spokeswoman. The police, appeared unprepared and at a loss as to how to handle the situation. At the height of the excitement close to 50 uniformed men were at the site of the disturbance. By 12:30 a.m. three men and three women had been arrested and the crowd had thinned to a handful of people.

Production aides wanted -- today!

Anyone interested in helping put out the Varsity is invited to a meeting this afternoon at the Varg office, 91 St. George St., 2nd floor.

We'll start with a general introduction to the Varsity, a tour through the offices and a step-by-step lesson in basic layout techniques at 2 p.m.

Then we'll move to an open discussion of the paper's design. Bring your criticisms and your suggestions.

Regular production personnel should also be on hand.

A curfew is an outrage. It is enacted against a group with no power. It deprives the youngster of one of the important socializing influences on his young life — hanging around.

NEW NEW PROGRAM HURTS

The General Committee of Faculty Arts and Sciences will meet today to discuss Erindale College's "New" New Program — a program that will gradually alter undergraduate instruction at this university.

The New New program would require all those students enrolled in a four-year degree to specialize in a discipline or complete two minor programs. All those in a three-year Bachelor of Arts program would be forced to complete a minor. In addition all students would be required to take at least one course from each of the humanities, social and natural sciences, obtain a credit for two mathematics or language courses and pass an English facility test within 12 months of joining the university. Failure to pass the test would result in indefinite suspension.

This peculiar hodge-podge may be introduced almost immediately at Erindale and, perhaps, "phased in" at the St. George campus.

A more incoherent solution to the problems afflicting the university could hardly be conceived. But the General Committee of the Faculty of Arts and Sciences, ever-sollicitous about the feelings of its country cousin, is not likely to delve deeply into the questionable merits of the New New Program. The opportunity of being able to convey the impression that the university is "doing something" about the concerns of employers, the public and the government is likely to entice the committee into abdicating its responsibility. A careful evaluation of the New New Program and its specific components is not likely.

The university at the moment is willing to do anything that will lead to the level of financial inflow to which it has grown accustomed. The Faculty of Arts and Science is likewise infected with this opportunistic attitude and is willing to be party to the subversion of the fundamental principles underlying its undergraduate programs. Oddly enough, the same faculty which earlier voiced its opposition to making French an admission requirement on the grounds that "saving the nation" is a "political hobbyhorse" is willing to accept job-market conditions as guides for constructing academic programs. It is willing to sacrifice the opportunity of offering its students general bachelor programs for an imagined change in the public perception of the university.

There does not appear to be a rational justification of the specific components of the proposal. English facility testing is still the subject of a university-wide discussion. Yet Erindale may be allowed to decide the matter without satisfying the university that it has devised a test capable of judging fairly their students' knowledge of English. Furthermore, the New New Program leaves undecided the question of what measures to take to help students who fail the test and the more important question of whether the university should delegate the development of basic skills to the high-school system.

The insistence on compulsory language or mathematics courses is also questionable. The Delzell committee report and its predecessors have failed to refer to any research or findings which would indicate that such requirements would have an explicit, beneficial academic impact.

The proposals essentially reflect the nostalgia of their originator Dean Morton. But as Edgar Friedenburg stated at the 1976 Annual Conference of the Ontario Association for Curriculum Development, "Sentimentality suppresses crucial insights precisely when they are most needed." Given the crisis situation at universities, we must ask whether we can afford a sentimental approach to the issues confronting us.

There is also the important consideration that the whole area of student motivation has been neglected. The latest statistics indicate that only 21.3 percent of Erindale students in a four-year degree program completed a major or obtained a special certification compared to 41.3 percent for the St. George campus. Out of the three-year bachelor students, only 2.3 percent at Erindale completed a minor as compared to 8.6 percent at St. George. Clearly students at Erindale, where the New New Program will be enforced first, are not motivated towards early specialization. The significantly lower marks at Erindale (the average Math mark was 54 percent compared to 67 percent at St. George) is likely to contribute to grade inflation as the New New Program at Erindale increases class sizes and causes the quality of education to deteriorate.

The failings of the New New Program proposals are attributable to the failure of its originators to take into account student opinion. The only student on the committee that drew up the proposals was a token part-time student appointed by the administration. Approval of the New New Program may massage a few academic and political egos but will also demonstrate that the university community is willing to sacrifice academic quality for public opportunism.

I am responding to the editorial "Professors doing well" in the November 2nd issue to correct factual errors and to comment on statements and accusations made in it. I hope that the University administration will also respond. The article says that academic staff have used their "power" to "look after themselves" at the expense of students and support staff. It states that last year's salary increase for academic staff was 9.4 percent (cost of living and merit increase) while support staff received only a 6.2 percent cost of living increase, and no merit increase. The Varsity has its facts wrong. The truth is that all staff, academic and support staff, received a cost of living increase of 6.2 percent. In addition funds were made available on exactly the same basis for academic and support staff, and were distributed based on merit only to all staff.

As far as last year's student fee increase is concerned, academic staff made their concerns for the effect of the fee increase on student accessibility known publicly (Bulletin, December 10, 1976) and the same is true for the increase in foreign student fees. As I am one of the three professors referred to in the editorial, who were involved in the writing of the Interim Report from the Planning and Priorities Sub-committee, I can state from first hand knowledge that the writer of the editorial badly misunderstands and quotes out of context that report to support his statements and accusations. At best, this piece of writing is incompetent journalism, at worst it is an irresponsible act to attempt to plant seeds of discord among students, academic and support staff, who, I believe, are collectively doing their best to carry on in the difficult times in which the country and the university find themselves.

Eastman too

The editorial and cartoon that appeared in the Varsity on 2 November 1977 are based on a misunderstanding of the salary policy of the University as it affects different groups. Salary classifications exist for both academic and non-academic staff. With a few exceptions affecting a small proportion of the latter group, these salaries were increased by a uniform 6.2 percent for 1977-78. Individuals in both categories were, in addition, eligible to receive a further increase in salary based on their performance during the previous year. This is the "merit" component of the salary increase and it varied between individuals. The average amount of money available for this component of the salary increase for academic staff was approximately 3.2 percent. For non-academic staff the average merit increase available for individuals who continued within the same salary category was also 3.2 percent. These increases were approved by the A.I.B.

It should be noted that the nature of salary categories differ for the two groups of staff. Academic staff are chiefly in the three professional ranks so that an individual would, in the course of a career, receive two promotions through the ranks. The non-academic staff have categories that are very numerous and relate to the specific characteristics of particular functions. In consequence, the latter group progress through their career less by rising through a particular rank but rather by progressing from one category to a higher one. It is in consequence impossible to judge what happens to typical individuals in the two groups by simply looking at the gross cost of salary increases for members of the continuing staff within salary classes for non-academic and academic staff. Nor can we look at the net cost of increase because the rate of turnover of staff varies between categories.

The intention and result of the salary policy followed in 1977-78 has been to maintain equity between the different groups of employees of the University.

OISE not callous

I read Mr. Bochna's letter, accusing O.I.S.E.'s Graduate Student's Society of showing callousness in its hiring procedures for a film co-ordinator. This letter greatly concerned me and I feel it might be helpful to explain the hiring procedures. The responsibility for hiring a new film co-ordinator was given to a committee made up of four volunteer students. The committee advertised widely in the press, distributed job descriptions, answered numerous telephone and personal inquiries for more information. All of the applicants, who wrote asking for more information were immediately sent a full job description. Each application was read by at least three members and the applicants were ranked and a short list was generated. Seven applicants were interviewed taking up at least two afternoons of the committee's time. A long meeting was necessary before a decision was made. The committee then informed all the unsuccessful applicants immediately by phone, personal letter or at last resort a form letter. This was a difficult and time consuming job for those, who had volunteered their time. I think we did a very commendable job. I agree that it would have been nice to send a letter of acknowledgement to applicants but given the time frame and our limited resources, I can't help thinking that this would have been in our case, a meaningless gesture. It is certainly not callousness on our part to decide not to send a form letter.

I would like to close by making an interesting observation. From our experience, the job market is extremely competitive. It is not enough to have the necessary skills for the job. You must also have the skills to sell yourself. We feel the present co-ordinator is excellent on presentation of self and skills for the job, which she applied.

That minority of Varsity staffers who have no confidence in the Editor must be being joined by an ever-increasing number of Varsity readers. Mario Cutajar assures us that his opinion pieces are not editorials — but the line between an editorial and an opinion piece written by the editor is a thin one. Mr. Cutajar is using his privileged position to grind his personal axes, which include condoning the use of terrorist violence in order to destroy the despised 'liberal state'. Once this has been abolished, we are told, a state of perfect happiness will automatically succeed it. Neither Mr. Cutajar nor his revolutionary friends appear to have any clear notion of what form this Utopia might take or what constructive measures might bring it into being.

It is sometimes necessary, though always regrettable, to resist violence and terror with its own weapons. Mr. Cutajar quotes the example of the French Resistance. In the present day one can sympathise with the southern African blacks who have been forced into violence by systematic oppression. However, groups like the German Bader-Meinhof gang and the Japanese Red Army, the spoils children of affluent countries, who have no genuine grievances and no objectives beyond violence for its own sake, belong in a different category. Attempts to condone the senseless murder (Mr. Cutajar calls it 'execution') of Hans-Martin Schleyer are simply sickening.

The student newspaper is supposed to represent the views of the entire student body, not merely those of a few political extremists. Mr. Cutajar should either resign and submit his views to the Varsity on the same basis as the rest of us, or shut up and get on with his job.

Attack on Kate Millet unwarranted

Because Janet Smith's 'Kate Millet Denigrates Women' letter in the Wednesday, November 2 issue of the Varsity was so replete with distortion, misrepresentation and misinterpretation the rebuttal that follows consists of a blow by blow refutation of same.

Smith characterizes Millet as a representative, accountable leader of the Women's Movement. This is contrary to Millet's own disavowal of authoritarian hierarchy in favour of the anarchistic, egalitarian nature of much of the movement.

Smith then goes on to condemn Millet for rejecting women "who don't share her views." Actually Millet hopes to get into a dialogue with these women. Moreover it is patronizing to offer unconditional support of women on the basis of biological status alone. Had Millet done so, I suspect that Smith would have faulted her for being 'sexist'.

Contrary to Smith's assertion, Millet at no time expressed 'contempt' or 'scorn' for the 'housewives, dimstore clerks, students and women on welfare,' that were present at rallies. Concerned as she is about grass roots outreach, she could not help but be delighted at such attendance, and only expressed regret that the experience could not have been a more rewarding one in the face of repeated disruptions on the part of the right. (I disagree with her there, for I think that it must have been edifying.)

Smith makes much of Millet's assertion that the right wing female backlash is manipulated-controlled by men, implying that such a contention is a result of anti-female bias. Even had Millet meant to imply that only men are capable of conventional organization, she would have meant no insult, opposed as she is to oppressive political structures. Actually she is fully aware of the existence of Feminist organization. What she did observe is a sociologically plausible fact (in view of male power, money and position) which can be either confirmed or refuted, neither of which Smith does.

Smith condemns Millet for her supposed denigration of the 'poor and ignorant' and then goes on to betray her own elitist bias by suggesting that Millet should respect-accept the Opponent's position on the basis of intellectual or achievement credentials. Millet recognizes that individual token success on patriarchal terms is at best inadequate; certainly it is no lasting alternative to collective-radical grass roots mobilization.

In answer to Millet's observed lack of respect for alleged audience fears regarding the threat which the Women's Movement poses to the nuclear family, Yes, Janet, we do challenge the nuclear family as a unit of socialization confinement, legal and psychological, towards women and children, in the context of an oppressive society.

Is to be concerned about a thematic and strategically consistent package of progressive demands (ERA, daycare, equal pay, etc.) not enough?

On the subject of rape: If 'no one is in favour of it,' why is it happening? Rape, both as ideology and fact, defends existing sexist institutions. In the final analysis, the ideology of rape that pervades society is enforced by this literal form of terrorism against women.

Finally, to demand that a movement hold views other than it represents because these views 'hurt' people like Smith is to demand that Feminism not offend by being other than it is. It is a currently fashionable form of cooperation for everyone to be a Feminist, and for Feminism to be all things to all people. Let those who oppose it be honest enough to say that they do!

While Millet's talk was often inadequate in terms of prescribing a strategy for combating the right wing backlash, it did point to some important directions in terms of cultural revolution; the integration of what are presently compartmentalized levels-dimensions of human being, the rejection of oppressive conventional varieties of political structure, opposition to dogma and institutions in favour of a flexible, critical, creative growth oriented posture to the world and struggle on the part of autonomous individuals. Invention and innovation may serve us better than meeting the enemy on terms in which they have the power advantage. The act of coalescing around specific issues rather than developing entrenched, rigid ongoing structures may be equally effective in meeting the danger. The debate regarding structure must continue. Meanwhile one thing seems certain. Authenticity, autonomy and involvement must merge in a new definition of art life and politics if the revolution is to be truly progressive in human terms.

I am writing with regard to your error-filled, misguided editorial of November 4 dealing with the recent conference of the National Union of Students (NUS) held in Calgary.

First, SAC did not send 8 delegates. As you have been told repeatedly, the SAC Board of Directors sent six delegates.

Secondly, the figure quoted as the SAC deficit is inaccurate. I suggest you review the SAC Budget to obtain the proper figures.

Thirdly, the general tenor of your irresponsible diatribe on NUS implies that NUS's actions of an educational and pressure-group lobbying nature are not really of benefit to students on a national basis. You of course do not allude to any of the successes NUS has achieved through its actions at the Federal Government level or at the local campus level in the areas of student aid, new job creation programmes, course union co-ordination, etc.

However, it does not seem to be pure incompetence that you neglected these points. Rather, the Varsity's real distaste for NUS is obvious. Unlike the Varsity, NUS does not advocate spontaneous student mass gatherings of violent, right-thinking left-leaning revolutionaries. Nor does NUS condone hijackings, fire-bombings, assassinations or other anarchistic thrills. Unlike yourself, NUS sees no value in terrorism as a way to address student concerns.

One last point: Before the Varsity chastizes SAC for sending one delegate too many to conferences, it should make sure its own-house is in order. Last year the Varsity overspent its conference budget by 100 percent. A little less hypocrisy would lend the smallest touch of credibility to your position.

Math aid available

In 'The Varsity' of Oct. 31, 1977, I read the article 'Frosh reactions to U of T' by Leslie Gooding. In it, it was stated, that it was particularly hard to get assistance in the Math Aid Centre. That remark prompts me to react, though not because I disagree with the article. At certain times it is indeed hard to get assistance, because there are too many students and not enough help at the times the students want help. If anybody has any suggestions on how to improve our service, without cutting down our service at other times, please write me at the Math Aid Centre (with a carbon copy to the Dean of Arts and Sciences).

Having said the above, I'd like to point out that there are times that the assistants in the Math Aid Centre could handle more students. The Math Aid Centre is not always overloaded. Try other hours, for example early or late in the day we can usually help more students. We are open at SS 1071 Monday 9-5, Tuesday-Thursday 9-7, Friday 9-3. Or try the other Math Aid Centres on campus: University College (Room 152), open Mon. and Wed. 10-4; Tues. and Thurs. 11-4; Fri. 10-3. St. Michael's College Math Aid Centre, Carr Hall, rooms 313 and 314, is especially handy for students, who spend their nights on campus. It is open Mon.-Thurs. 7-9.30. The University College and St. Michael's College Math Aid Centres have not been filled to capacity.

However, any suggestions to improve our services are welcomed by me. The Math Dept. will do its utmost to be of service to all undergraduate math students in its Math Aid Centres.

Nazi Newsreels offensive to ethnic minorities and democrats

A film entitled "THE NAZI NEWSREELS OF JOSEPH GOEBBELS" is currently being featured at Innis College. The first of these "authentic Nazi newsreels" was shown on November 1. The series is to continue November 8 and 15. The sponsor of the series, Regus Films, claims it has no connections with the Western Guard or other fascist organizations, but the brochure advertising the series states: "You will see crowds of people welcoming and cheering Hitler's troops as they liberate the Rhineland and Austria; You will see pre-Hitler Germany with its breadlines, prostitution, riots and social unrest contrasted with the order and vitality of the Nazi regime and you will begin to understand why the German people and their neighbours willingly donned the yoke of National Socialism."

Irrespective of the intentions of Regus Films in promoting these films, they are Nazi propaganda — the propaganda that aided the Nazis in their savage slaughter of millions. The gas chambers, the soap made from human remains, the photos of towering mounds of corpses, the ghastly testimony of thousands of survivors — these are the testimony to the outcome of fascist propaganda. The Nazi newsreels are an insult and affront to Jews and all ethnic minorities, communists, workers, and all those concerned about democratic rights.

These films are not a mere 'cultural event'. They serve to embolden those dedicated to the genocide of ethnic and racial minorities, and the destruction of labor organizations and democratic rights. Previous Nazi propaganda films shown at Innis have been a rallying point for fascist organizations. The undersigned protest and oppose the showing of "Nazi Newsreels" (organizations in parenthesis are for identification purposes only):

The CRTC: "A Cultural Barrier"

By Eric Starkman

Canadian national unity and identity is a subject as old as the country itself. When Canada was founded in 1867, the Fathers of Confederation had to contend with two major problems: American domination from the south and a dissatisfied French Canada. Today the front pages of our dailies make it clear that we still face exactly the same problems.

At present our government is attempting to alleviate these problems by creating a "national identity". And since the current mode of thinking is that culture is the largest component of identity, the government has developed several instruments for "creating" an indigenous Canadian cultural expression. One of these is the Canadian Radio and Television Commission (CRTC). Its mandate is found in the Broadcasting Act of 1967-68, which states that "the objectives of the broadcasting policy for Canada . . . can be achieved by providing for the regulation and supervision of the Canadian broadcasting system by a single independent authority."

Since its founding the CRTC has been an activist agency. In its initial report it stated "... like the 'defences' of a nation, broadcasting must serve yet other objectives to 'safeguard, enrich and strengthen . . . the fabric! This calls for 'Canadian' content, form and functions in broadcast programming." In light of this view, it has enacted legislation which imposes Canadian content quotas on radio and television stations, requires that the ownership of all electronic facilities in Canada be under Canadian control, and forces cable T.V. operators to meet a myriad of regulations ranging from a list of signal priorities to requiring community programming. The CRTC has gone so far as to define what constitutes being "Canadian" and what "good" programming is.

In effect, the CRTC is attempting to erect a cultural barrier around Canada. The direction of its policies has been towards insuring that what we see or hear on radio and television is predominantly Canadian (according to its definition). The CRTC feel that too much American culture has permeated Canada, and must now be forced out — and the CRTC is willing to go to the courts to insure that it is. The CRTC believes that if the American cultural influence were eliminated from this country, a vibrant Canadian culture would develop in its place. Needless to say, the results of its regulations do not support this hypothesis.

Although in theory the objectives of the CRTC are impressive, the aims and means employed to attain its desired end are neither practical nor desirable. Inherent in all the CRTC regulations are numerous assumptions which are unfounded and, in some cases, simply untrue. One of the initial acts of the CRTC was to guarantee that the ownership of any single broadcast system be no more than 20 per cent of foreign origin. The CRTC believes that if an owner of a broadcast system is Canadian, he will be more responsible in meeting the needs of a community than would be a foreign owner. Yet if we examine the record of the Canadian business community, we find little evidence to support this assumption.

An unwritten rule in the business community states that business knows no borders. Several years ago the Royal Bank of Canada ran an advertisement in various U.S. business newspapers and periodicals entitled "We Deliver Canada". The advertisement went on to say how the Royal Bank would assist American industry in expanding into Canada. The advertisement did not express nationalist sentiments.

According to Professor Sid Noel of the University of Western Ontario, Canada has always had the money to develop its own resources, but Canadian businessmen have been afraid to invest their own capital. Instead they generated American capital into Canada which has resulted in American domination of all sectors of our economic life. Many credit this as being the principal cause of the Americanization of Canadian culture. History shows that the Canadian businessman's paramount interest is not in Canada, but in profits. Accordingly, we should not look to him for any solace for our ongoing problems.

When the CRTC insisted that all foreign interests in Canadian broadcasting systems be divested, it aggravated another problem which is as distressing as foreign ownership — concentration of ownership. In Canada 14 men are in control of a substantial part of our communication system. As a result of the CRTC legislation these men monopolized their interests even further.

There never were so many foreign-controlled broadcast systems as to present a problem, but they were operating at a profit, and there was no risk involved when purchasing them. The CRTC literally paved the way for our communications system to be consolidated in the hands of a few. And there is no evidence that these Canadian owners have acted any more responsibly than their American counterparts (see box this page: "CKLW Canadian?")

Those who control our broadcast systems are constantly using the guise of "preserving our national identity" in order to protect their financial interests. In October 1969, during a discussion of the expansion of the cable T.V. industry (which meant more American stations reaching the Canadian market), a CTV network spokesman complained that if unrestricted fragmentation of a market by cable is allowed, "the economic health of the industry will suffer" and "the cost to the public . . . would be $4.00 a month and a loss of their identity". Given the track record of broadcasting system owners (and especially of John Bassett, president of Baton Broadcasting, which owns CFTO) it is most probable that what concerned CFTO was not the loss of Canadian identity, but reduction of its profits.

Similarly, other groups often hop on the "national identity" bandwagon in order to promote their own selfish interests. All the broadcast unions — The Association of Canadian Television and Radio Artists, The Directors Guild of Canada, Canadian Unions of Public Employees, The National Associations of Broadcasting Employees and Technicians — favour complete implementation of the CRTC content regulations, and in some cases, even stricter regulations. They too complain that the American influence has impeded the development of Canadian performers.

Yet the fact remains that Canada's most notable artists are those who made their name prior to the implementation of content regulations. If it is Canadian national identity with which these performers are so concerned, perhaps they should be required to donate a percentage of their profits to a fund to develop additional Canadian talent. Ian Tyson would no doubt sacrifice some exposure before giving up one of his Cadillacs.

Because of its licensing powers,

the CRTC has broadcasters at its mercy, and it has quite frequently flexed its muscles. Often it acts discreetly. In 1974, for example, the CRTC agreed to allow CITY-TV, Toronto, to have its transmitter atop the CN Tower. The CRTC stated that it was satisfied with CITY's performance, but claimed that it had received numerous complaints about CITY's programming. These were no doubt in reference to the "Baby Blue" movies which it ran every Friday night at midnight (a policy which received publicity across the entire continent). The CRTC did not openly forbid the showing of the "Blue" movies but "reminded CITY that its increased coverage would include many new viewers and that its responsibility was to select topics and program forms . . . that will be of value and interest to the audience". The implication of the CRTC was clear. Channel 79 no longer shows "Baby Blue" movies.

Last year, when the license of Toronto rock station CFTR came up for renewal, it was granted a license for only six months (The traditional period is five years). According to a story in the Toronto Star, this action was a result of the CRTC being unhappy with the manner in which CFTR presented its news. In particular, the Commission was dissatisfied with newsmen Larry Silver, who wrote and presented his newscasts in a most sensational manner. Larry Silver has since toned down his newscasts. (although station manager Chuck Camroux denies that this had anything to do with the CRTC's action).

The CRTC has been reluctant to admit the various ill effects of its own legislation. "Sesame Street", a popular children's program produced by the U.S. Public Broadcasting System was allowed to be shown in Canada under the condition that it be aired without commercials. When the CRTC limited the amount of foreign material that could be shown from any one country to 30 per cent, most private stations eliminated "Sesame Street" because it was not a profitable venture. But when the CRTC was inundated with letters from irate parents accusing the CRTC for being responsible, the Commission declared "it is a choice to be made by broadcasters to show 'Sesame Street' and to eliminate another American program, or to eliminate 'Sesame Street' and instead show another program". Finally, despite its refusal to take the blame, the Commission agreed to extend the percentage of programs imported from the United States to 35 per cent if the extra 5 per cent was caused by the showing of "Sesame Street".

Another disturbing feature of the CRTC is its criteria for judging success. In its 1970-71 annual report

CKLW Canadian?

By ERIC STARKMAN

Radio station CKLW in Windsor is somewhat of an anomaly in Canadian broadcasting. Originally owned by RKO General, it was sold in 1969 to Baton Broadcasting when the CRTC legislation forbidding foreign ownership was passed. In its heyday CKLW was not only a dominant radio station in the Windsor-Detroit area, but was popular in Cleveland and Toledo as well. At one point it was rated as the number three rock station in North America.

When CKLW was owned by RKO General, the station was run predominantly by Americans for Americans. Its market was the Michigan-Ohio area, and there was full-time sales staff working in Detroit. The bulk of its sales revenues was from American advertising.

Since Baton purchased CKLW, little has changed. It is still a station run by Americans for Americans.

The bulk of its revenue continues to be American advertising (to the tune of four million dollars per year). There has been only a token increase in the number of Canadians working at the station. As recently as a month ago, CKLW attempted to hire an American woman, with no previous experience, to be trained as a producer for its morning show. They were unable to do this only because the Department of Immigration would not issue her a visa.

Baton Broadcasting also owns CFTO-TV in Toronto. Baton's president, John Bassett, has been one of the most vociferous crusaders in the effort to prevent Toronto sponsors from buying commercial time on Buffalo TV stations. Maybe he just forgot about that four million in Windsor.

Who says you can't have your cake and eat it too?

negative Canadian stereotypes.

American stations has actually increased. Here in Toronto, certain Buffalo stations have an audience almost as large as do local stations. In the United States, the programming of Buffalo radio stations is not regarded as being particularly good. Yet many Torontonians consider it to be a better alternative than what they have in their own city. Content regulations are useless if no one is listening.

The CRTC has not acted in accord with the principles and ideals which one expects from a democratic government. Defining what is good for a country and then forcing broadcasters to adhere to this definition is a potential political nightmare. The CRTC's unwillingness to admit mistakes coupled with its distorted sense of logic, is establishing dangerous precedents for the future. If the government were to introduce content regulations for the press as well, we will be on our way towards a government controlled press. History manifests what will follow.

If it is possible to develop a national identity, it will not come from promoting "mass culture". The popular music scene today is merely a passing fad — twenty years from now who will remember the Bachman-Turner Overdrive? For the most part the individuals (I cannot bring myself to call them artists) involved with this sort of music are interested in "making it" in the United States, and fattening their bank books. Their music does not usually reflect anything Canadian, but is an emulation of styles and trends developed in the United States. Too often, after these individuals have "made it", they show little gratitude to the country which gave them their break. Anne Murray (Canada's pride and joy), who owes her success to the content regulations in general, and the CBC in particular, will no longer perform in CBC specials. Apparently, after doing the American talk show circuit, CBC specials become anticlimactic.

Although we have not produced many well-known artists in the popular music scene, (more talent in this area has emanated from the State of Michigan) we have made a significant contribution to the "arts". In areas such as classical music and ballet, this country is highly respected throughout the world. In many cases we have not only developed our own talent, but attracted artists from other countries as well. Of significance is that we have been able to do this without protective barriers. The National Ballet of Canada has not demanded that foreign ballet troupes be excluded from Canada. It is willing to compete with the best, and few would argue that it has not been successful.

Instead of spending millions on supporting an agency like the CRTC, which is dedicated to promoting passing fads, would it not be wiser to channel these funds towards groups and organizations which are truly dedicated towards promoting a national identity? Would not the money spent on the CRTC's legal fees be better spent on the National Ballet of Canada? The National Ballet of Canada has earned us international recognition and respect — no popular Canadian artist has managed to do this. Currently government grants account for only 24.8 per cent of its annual budget. It could use the money.

The Broadcasting Act of 1967-68 should be revised. A new commission should be set up to regulate broadcasting. This commission should attempt to stimulate competition, rather than stifle it, and create an environment of competition. Profit is an excellent motivation for market research. If broadcasters are forced to compete, no doubt the needs and wants of the Canadian public will be sought out, and higher quality programming achieved. And at no expense to the Canadian taxpayer!

There is evidence that this may happen. With its penchant for regulation, the CRTC has often stretched its hand into areas in which it has no legal jurisdiction. In February of last year, a case was presented before the federal courts involving the commercial deletion required by cable operators. The case was instituted by the owners of three Buffalo T.V. stations. The results are still pending. Daniel Baum, a law professor at York University Law School, has commented on the CRTC policy regulations. "Often not questioned, and left unchecked, the agency has asserted jurisdiction... in a manner... that presents ultra vires action". Baum concludes "that the day of the CRTC are numbered" and "subject to broad guidelines, remaining broadcast regulations... may be left to the provinces". In the interest of Canadian national unity and identity, let's hope Baum is right.

A Glossary

As the literature on the Canadian broadcast industry is somewhat esoteric, a glossary of names, words and phrases pertaining to the Canadian broadcast industry is provided below:

CRTC — Canadian Radio and Television Commission. The government agency which has aided Canadian broadcast owners in monopolizing the industry, and increasing its profits.

"Foreign cultural domination" — an euphemism for American cultural domination.

"Highest consideration and encouragement" — the CRTC's way of telling broadcasters they had better do it, or else.

"National unity and identity" — the phrase Canadian broadcasters use to rid themselves of American competition.

CBC Radio — An aberration in Canadian broadcasting. Respected throughout the world for its quality programming.

CBC Television — the antithesis of CBC Radio.

Radio Canada — The French counterpart to the CBC. Strong supporter for an independent Canada — and an independent Quebec.

ACTRA — Association of Canadian Television and Radio Artists. A union of second rate performers who demand that any production done in this country should employ only Canadians — regardless of talent. Cannot tolerate having talented members as a part of its union. Recently fined and suspended singer Maureen Forrester and magician Doug Henning for appearing on a CBC-TV musical, the Goldrush Follies.

Grant, Peter — Special counsel to the CRTC. One of the first lawyers to realize how much money could be made in Communications Law. When he is not serving his country, he teaches Communication Law at our law school.

Lightfoot, Gordon — A Canadian who made his name without the help of the CRTC content regulations. His words and music often reflect Canadian themes. Although he complains of "overexposure", he still portrays himself as a Canadian.

Canada — A country which continues to believe that it does not have a culture despite its artistic contributions in areas such as ballet, classical music, and art. Wants to produce a Gong Show of its very own.

Job outlook "limited" for OISE graduates

By JOHN CAMERON

The attractive academic ambience of the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE) was pitted against the bleak job prospects the institute affords its graduates, career-seeking students were told on Wednesday.

Approximately 30 people, primarily women in their third and fourth years at university, attended the career talk on OISE, in the Medical Sciences Building, organized by the Career Counselling and Placement Centre (CCPC) of U of T.

In response to a question from the audience regarding the degree of realism in studying at OISE with career training as the primary objective, OISE Administrator Andy Effrat indicated he felt that studying at OISE would do more than satisfy one's "intrinsic interest" in the field of education.

Effrat said many graduates find jobs in areas such as academic teaching of education principles, in government institutes and with Boards of Education. He admitted that job opportunities upon graduation from OISE are extremely limited but feels this is true of any field of study and that OISE graduates "are competing quite effectively with other graduates in areas such as person-power training with the government, in the development of women's studies packages and in the area of adult education."

Chairperson of the Department of Applied Psychology at OISE John Weiser pointed out that a few years ago OISE graduates received many job offers in early spring but now they generally find some sort of job by August.

According to Effrat, the "unemployment problem of OISE students upon graduation is very, very slight."

However, of the 2,000 part-time students enrolled at OISE, 1,700 to 1,800 are currently employed as full-time teachers or administrators seeking to better their qualifications, he said.

Humane place

OISE Students' Association President Peter Johnstone stated he feels that studying at OISE is a valuable experience partly because of the fact that "employers are looking for a second degree nowadays and that one degree is often just not enough."

Johnstone suggested pursuing a career such as teaching English as a second language with the goal of teaching abroad as one way to deal with the difficult problem of job availability and cutbacks in the education system.

In his opening remarks Effrat said that one of the advantages of OISE over other graduate schools is that OISE is a "humane and flexible place" with a faculty that is very accessible and available to the students. A pamphlet handed out at the seminar stated "the student-to-professor ratio is approximately 13 to 1 for MA and M.Ed. programs, and 7 to 1 for PhD and EdD programs."

The seminar pointed out that most students had some teaching experience but many come directly from undergraduate programs. Effrat made it clear that a B.Ed. is not at all necessary for admission and that, in fact, OISE does not certify teachers. Such certification must be obtained from such institutions as the Faculty of Education.

According to Effrat, OISE admission standards are similar to those of other graduate schools at U of T. Generally speaking, he said, a mid-B average with good letters of reference regarding an individual's academic performance and ability to undertake serious graduate work will admit one into OISE. However, some departments examine actual work experience and tests such as the Graduate Record Examination (GRE).

David Askew, a part-time student at OISE and moderator of the seminar, suggested that a counselling career was a difficult area for job opportunities and implied that students should have second thoughts about studying such a field at OISE if a related job was the primary motivation for such study.

A tape of the first half of the hour-long seminar is available at the CCPC for any person who missed the seminar.

'State leads racist attacks'

By ERIC McMILLAN

Appealing to the government will not stop racist attacks in Canada, a spokesman for the Canadian People's Defense Committee (CPDC) told a meeting of 30 students and workers at U of T Thursday.

Speakers from three defense organizations said immigrants and Canadians must organize in their self-defense to halt these attacks.

The meeting was held in preparation for a demonstration at City Hall yesterday against these attacks. About 1,500 demonstrators, more than a third of them from the three defense organizations, rallied at City Hall and marched to Queen's Park. About 500 supporters of CPDC, the East Indian Defense Committee (EIDC), and the West Indian People's Organization (WIPO) were still rallying at the university Medical Sciences Auditorium late Sunday afternoon.

Waterloo professor Doug Wahlsten, the CPDC spokesman, noted Thursday that people are wondering what the cause of the racist attacks is and what to do about them. He charged the Canadian state and the police with organizing and abetting attacks on immigrants and Canadians.

Wahlsten cited the new immigration bill C-24 as an example of such an attack. The bill, for example, allows the deportation of immigrants for supporting the overthrow of any government in the world.

Wahlsten also charged the police with not coming to the aid of victims of attacks, but instead arriving only to arrest the victims when they fight back against their assailants.

The EIDC representative said this was nothing new. He gave examples of the Canadian government's attacking East Indians since 1902. Like Wahlsten he differentiated between the Canadian state and the Canadian people who he said were not racist.

The EIDC spokesman criticized the police and media for saying the East Indian organization was calling for "vigilantes" and "taking the law into their own hands." He said people had to defend themselves on the scene of an attack but also had to organize the community to make it more conscious that the attacks on them originate from the state.

Wahlsten said the long term goal of CPDC is to establish a truly democratic state in Canada.

"Genuine democracy means freedom from racist attacks among other things," he said.

"The myth of student apathy has been dealt a serious blow this week," said Students' Administrative Council (SAC) Education Commissioner Marjan Glavac. "The success of SAC's Preview Week is due to the overwhelming support of volunteers."

More than 500 U of T students are taking part in the week's activities to acquaint 1,200 Metro high school students with St. George Campus life, he said.

The primary purpose of the project is to introduce high school students to undergrads with similar areas of academic interest. The high school students then attend several days of classes and take part in an average day on campus.

Several group events were also planned.

A social tour highlighted primary points of interest — everything from Hart House to the Innis Pub.

The visitors were also introduced to various features of the library system.

Rose Gotfried, a guidance counsellor at Weston Road Collegiate Institute, said: "Preview Week serves a vital purpose. This field trip is a good, exciting experience the students should profit from."

Preview Week Coordinator Cathy McDonald suggested that because of the interest generated Preview Week may be kept alive as an on-going event.

MacDonald said the project may be "one way of extending our university into the realm of serving the community."

High school students interviewed all felt encouraged by the university's attempts to make them feel welcome. SAC is also organizing a wine and cheese party for mid-November to get all the participants together in a non-academic setting.

Museums forced to co-operate

By IAN SMITH

Museums have been forced to co-operate with each other recently to share resources during times of funding shortages and the energy crisis said Bernard Ostry, Secretary-General of the National Museums of Canada. He was addressing the joint annual conference of the Ontario Museum Association and the Northeast Museums Conference at the Hyatt Regency Hotel Wednesday night. He stressed, however, that a "coercive co-operation" should not be the objective.

Ostry, speaking to 300 delegates from the United States and Canada, elaborated on the conference's theme of "Helping Each Other". He said museums should be working in a common spirit locally, provincially, nationally and internationally for a higher good. "The realms of science, art and learning are not private domains; they are universal," stated Ostry. Ostry said it was time to give up the grosser forms of self-interest, extreme nationalism and provincialism. He alluded to a number of such problems of co-operation which the conference could hope to come to grips with: museums within the federal authority which make no effort to co-ordinate their activities; museums which compete rather than co-operate with each other; animosity between museum directors; political interference; and a tendency of museums to downgrade other museums' achievements.

Ostry emphasized the need for, and evidence of, increasing co-operation among governments, museums, corporations and the public at large to enable museums to serve their communities. "Co-operative progress can only be made by an informal active participation in pursuit of common objectives by all those involved in museum work," he stated.

Ostry cited the donation of electrical machinery by Ontario Hydro to the National Museum of Science and Technology as an example of such progress. Another was the purchase of the American Bi-centennial train, purchased through the combined assistance of the federal and provincial governments, private corporations and foundations, to assemble a "discovery train" with 10,000 feet of exhibition space.

Ostry said that "governments and the public are coming to see that museums have a vital role in the raising of national, provincial and local identities." Museums should strive to maintain their credibility by avoiding internal bickering which tarnishes the museums' image and effectiveness. Museums must also strive to show that they are not just "scholarly sanctuaries of the past but lively participants of their community," he added. Activities such as book launchings, fashion shows and travelling exhibitions were cited by Ostry as steps toward achieving this goal.

Ostry said he was confident that museums can survive and even flourish in these hard times if a spirit of forbearance, tolerance and co-operation is forthcoming. "It is up to the museum professionals themselves," he said, "to evince this co-operative spirit which will enable museum people to mediate their differences."

"high risk," if successfully realized, implies "high reward."

Betcherman outlined two traditional options for the graduating lawyer. The first is to join an established firm, although these positions are not as available as they once were. A second alternative is to open an office with or without partner. But bank loans nowadays are less forthcoming than in the past, she warned.

A third avenue which provides optimism is the undertaking of law-related occupations such as exist in government and business. She iterated that only one of every three lawyers in the U.S. practice law. In Canada there exists a great untapped field in this respect, she allowed. A key is to seek "non-traditional means" of applying legal knowledge. Betcherman, for example, was director of research for the CBC television series "Ombudsman," she told the audience.

Betcherman also addressed the topic of women in law. There are large numbers both practicing and presently attending law school, she explained. Sexual prejudices in Law School are now non-existent, she said.

Women Begin Hockey Season

The women's hockey season got under way with the York Invitational Tournament last Friday and Saturday.

The McMaster-Maurauderettes won the York Women's Invitational Hockey Tournament played at the York Ice Palace on Friday and Saturday. They had victories of 10-0 over Queen's and 8-1 over Toronto to pace them to the title.

Against Toronto, the Maurauderettes got a three goal performance from Mern Coveny while Linda Murdoch and Schannalea Cope potted two each and Kelly Dobson got one.

The Blues had better luck in their other games defeating Huntington 5-1 and Concordia 3-1. Against Huntington, Linda Harley and Val Bush had two goals each with Betty Cook scoring the other. Maureen Mitchell, Wendy Hall and Cook scored in the win over Concordia.

The Blues next game is on Tuesday when they return to the York Ice Palace to meet the Yeomen. Game time is 7:30.

Balanced Attack Downs Laurentian 7-1

By JIM O'LEARY

Billy Harris made his intercollegiate coaching debut last Friday, bringing his Laurentian Voyageurs to Varsity Arena to meet the Blues. For Harris, the game was reminiscent of the days he spent behind the Toronto Toro's bench as he watched his team fall 7-1 to the powerful Varsity squad.

Harris took the coaching job at Laurentian this autumn after completing a season coaching the Italian National team. Toronto fans will remember him for the years he spent toiling for the Leafs and coaching the now defunct Toronto Toros.

The Blues were just too strong for the inexperienced Voyageurs. Varsity coach, Tom Watt, used three lines and three sets of defencemen throughout the game. The fact that the scoring was distributed between six different players and that 11 different players picked up at least one point is indicative of the depth of this year's team.

It is this balance which makes the outlook for this season so optimistic. According to Watt "opposing teams can't match lines against Toronto because if they put their checkers against one line, the others will pick up the slack."

Alex Jeans started the scoring with an unassisted effort before the game was two minutes old. The lead was short lived however, as the Voyageurs came back to score their only goal and tie the game a couple of minutes later.

Toronto regained the lead before the period ended on a beautiful goal by Cary Farelli. Dan D'Alvise put Farelli in alone on the Laurentian netminder with a perfect pass. The talented right-winger made no mistake as he deked the goalie and slid a backhand into the net.

Despite leaving the ice with a 2-1 lead at the end of the first period, Watt was not happy with the play of the team. Whatever he had to say to the players between periods certainly worked, however, as they came out like gangbusters for the second.

They jumped into a 6-1 lead in this period on goals by Doug Caines, Larry Hopkins, Frank Davis and Ron Harris. Caines' goal was a power play effort with assists going to Gemmel and Jeans. Hopkins scored on a hard wrist shot which found the top corner. The play was set up with great effort by defenceman Joe Grant. Davis concluded a pretty three way passing play with Doug Herridge and Farelli by slipping the puck in the net. Harris closed off the period with a power play goal assisted by Davis and Charlie Hughes.

Besides the offensive prowess, the Blues played very well defensively in the second period. They limited the Voyageurs to only six shots and effectively killed off a two man disadvantage with Herridge and Harris doing the brunt of the work. Goalie Dave Logan was also called upon to make a couple of big saves.

In the third, the play of the Blues tailed off a bit as both teams seemed to be content with playing out the clock. The only excitement came on a goal by Harris and on a two man advantage power play by the Blues.

On Harris' goal, Hughes did a good job to trap the puck at the blueline and keep the play in the Laurentian zone. Harris picked up the puck in the corner, swept around the net and tucked the puck in the corner as he moved out in front.

While Toronto didn't score when they had a two man advantage for over two minutes, Watt was pleased with their play. It took four good stops by the Laurentian netminder to keep the Blues from upping the score. According to Watt "it's true we didn't score but we did a lot of great things when we had the advantage. Our players controlled the puck very well."

Blues' Lines: The Blues outshot Laurentian 49-14. . . Dan D'Alvise was cut for stitches above the eye when his head struck the ice with only 1:34 left in the game. . . Rookies Brad Tamblyn and Joe Grant continued to impress on defence. . . Once again attendance was a disappointment with under 300 spectators present. . . The Blues next home game is against the Ryerson Rams on Wednesday at 8 pm.

The University of Waterloo came to Toronto with a perfect 6-0 record on Saturday. When they left the Back Campus the Warriors had upped their record to 7-0 with a 17-9 win over The Blues.

For the Blues the loss marked the end of the season. For Waterloo it was a stepping stone to next week's championship against Western.

The Warriors were led by Peter Kewin who had a pair of tries. Mitch Hammer had one try and Dave King had a convert and a drop-goal.

The Blues' scoring was done by Dave Wortzman and Chris Alexion. Wortzman had a try while Alexion booted the rest of the points.

Waterloo has never won the championship but hope to defeat a strong Western team next week. In their only meeting this year Waterloo won 9-7 in a hard fought game.

Wrestlers Look Good At RMC

By JIM O'LEARY

The Varsity wrestling team kicked off their season with an impressive showing at the Royal Military College Open on Saturday. While team standings or points are not compiled, coach Joe Rabel was impressed with some of the individual performances turned in by Toronto's veteran wrestlers.

Leading the list is assistant coach Rob Moore who placed first in the 142 pound class. Rabel said Moore was "spectacular" in winning his six fights and placing ahead of 13 others in his weight class. Five of his fights were decided by pins.

According to Rabel fourth year phys-ed student Ed Rector, "fought the best he ever has" to place first in the 190 pound class. Of his four fights, he pinned his opponents three times while winning a decision in the other.

Bill Hogarth placed second in the 167 pound class but according to Rabel that was the best that could have been expected considering his opposition. To win, Hogarth would have had to beat Victor Zilberman, coach of the Quebec provincial team, who as recently as two years ago placed third in the world.

Toronto's sophomore wrestlers did not bring home any trophies but according to Rabel they gained the irreplaceable experience which makes a good wrestler. Angelo Callegari, Ted Sheppard and Sam Turchiaro accumulated an assortment of wins and losses in their fights.

The RMC meet marked the first taste of intercollegiate competition for five of Toronto's wrestlers. According to Rabel, competition for the rookies is not as concerned with winning and losing as it is with learning. "The novices have to learn to act in a relaxed and cool manner in the ring. This can be a lesson in itself," says Rabel. Toronto's novices are Terry Murray, Joe Giancola, Keith Berry, Andy Smits and Gerry Ranking.

Mustangs keep rolling

By JIM O'LEARY

While it is probably of little consolation to Ron Murphy and the rest of the football Blues coaching staff, the University of Western Ontario Mustangs proved that it is indeed possible to beat the Laurier Golden Hawks by disregarding the run and concentrating on the passing game. In the QOIFC (west) final played at Western on Saturday the Mustangs passed for 242 yards while rushing for only 28 in a 22-17 victory.

Western quarterback Jamie Bone came off the injury list to throw two touchdown passes and lead the Mustangs to victory. On Western's first possession of the game he led the team 73 yards downfield and connected on a 13 yard touchdown pass to Walt Payerl.

In the second quarter he hit all-star Craig Labett with a 50-yard touchdown strike. The rest of the Mustang points came from the toe of placekicker Paul Ford.

As expected the Laurier offence centred around the running game. They piled up 245 yards along the ground while passing for only 24 yards.

Unfortunately for the Hawks, their star fullback Jim Reid was forced to sit out half the game with a painful hip pointer. Reid's absence made it difficult for the Hawks to play with consistency and forced them to throw unsuccessfully on first down.

Laurier's touchdowns came on a 32 yard run by quarterback Paul Nelson and a 10-yard romp by Les Protopapas. A late Hawk rally with Reid back in the game, proved to be insufficient to prevent the Hawks from concluding their season.

The Western victory means the Mustangs will face the surprising University of Calgary Dinosuars in next week's Forest City Bowl at London. The winner will go on to the College Bowl the following week.

The Dinosuars, who were picked by the so-called experts to finish last this year, rallied in the fourth quarter to beat the defending champs from the University of British Columbia 13-12 in a game played Friday night.

In next week's other game, the Queen's Golden Gaels will face the Acadia Axemen for the other birth in the College Bowl.

Queen's rolled over the sBishop Gaiters 45-27 on Saturday. The Golden Gaels entered the third quarter trailing 21-14 but broke the game wide open by scoring three touchdowns within a five minute stretch. Queen's was led by fullback Dave Marinucci who rushed for 211 yards.

The Axemen repeated as Maritime champions by crushing the St. Francis Xavier X-Men 32-1. Last year's College Bowl finalist, the Axemen were tied by a strong ground game which rolled for 265 yards.

Scar council exec sues past pres

By RICK BOGACZ

A legal suit for $400 is being brought against last year's Scarborough College Student Council (SCSC) president Gary Sands by this year's council executive, SCSC president John Shalagan said.

Shalagan stated in a phone interview that Sands overdraw in his own salary last year and the SCSC found that he owed them $832.42. Sands has already paid $350 of this total but has not advanced any more payments since May 6 of this year. He mailed a letter to the SCSC on this day saying that he would forward the remaining balance.

With no word from Sands since then, Shalagan and SCSC vice-president Paul Seelig decided they had waited long enough for the balance. On October 21 they elected to issue a writ from small claims court suing Sands for $400 instead of the original $482.42. According to Seelig the $82.42 was omitted because the small claims court would not preside over a case involving amounts over $400.

Shalagan also explained that Sands informed the SCSC office the first Monday after October 21 that he was awaiting a letter stating the amount he should pay. Shalagan refers to this as being "pure baloney" because he himself is certain that Sands knew all along how much was still owed to the council. Shalagan also feels that Sands was stalling for time in an attempt to see if the SCSC would admit that the whole affair was a simple accounting error.

Sands himself was not available for comment. It appears to be only a month since he moved from his former residence into a new apartment where the telephone is not yet in working order.

When Shalagan was first interviewed he expressed some concern that the resultant publicity might hamper communication with Sands.

Scarborough College principal Joan Foley commented that this year's student council was trying very hard to revive its image which has been so badly damaged by past events. She also added that it was "truly unfortunate" that this type of extreme measure must be taken. She added, however, that it is essential these matters be cleared up immediately.

Admin stalls talks union boss says

By PETER ARUVALD

A recent radical change in the administration's attitude in bargaining has cast doubts on whether an early agreement can be reached with the Graduate Assistant's Association (GAA) according to GAA Vice-President Nelson Rowland.

For the past two months the GAA has been negotiating with the administration for a new contract to replace the one which expired on August 31 of this year. The association was asking for higher salaries, a fringe benefits program and smaller tutorial groups. Up until last Wednesday, Rowland said, negotiations had been progressing satisfactorily.

"For two months we were truly bargaining," he stated. "Our only problem was getting the administration to reveal the reasons for their objections to our proposals."

The rest of the GAA executive, which includes business agent Jean Greatbatch, president Steven Baer and division "1" representative Catherine Emerson, agrees that except for the objections, steady progress was being made. There had been discussion of several major points and the GAA had initiated some minor ones, such as union security, appointments and access to information. But according to Rowland, at last Wednesday's meeting, the change in the administration's attitude toward bargaining was "tantamount to not bargaining at all."

GAA spokesmen say that two weeks ago John Parker, U of T Manager of Labor Relations, promised to introduce to the GAA a "total package" of all non-monetary issues. To the GAA's surprise, however, some points which the GAA considered important were disregarded in the "package". The introduction of several "letters of intent" also caused the GAA great concern.

Letters of intent, explains Rowland, are normally used to clarify previous clauses of an agreement, or if certain clauses will not take effect at the same time as the collective agreement, the letters state the date of implementation. The GAA says the administration is using these "letters of intent" to negate clauses without sufficient reason. They are not clauses in themselves and not legally binding, and thus the administration is negating GAA clauses without proposing new ones, according to Rowland. Emerson points out that in this case, even if the "letters of intent" were favorable, "the administration would not be obligated to honor them."

Parker has suggested that on some points, the two parties should come to an "informal" agreement, but as far as the GAA is concerned, there is then no point to bargain at all. Says Rowland, "the administration is being uncooperative and is dragging its feet."

Of even greater concern to the GAA is the administration's proposal of a five percent pay increase. Considering the rapid increase in the cost of living, the GAA feels that this is actually a 3.4 percent pay cut.

Rowland points out that this is the lowest pay increase offered to any union on campus, and that the faculty association, which is not a union, received a 9.4 percent pay increase. The original GAA proposal of bringing the salary of all graduate assistants up to the PhD level of pay was "rejected by silence." "There was no intent to bargain shown," says Rowland.

The shift to a "non-bargaining attitude" results from two days of meetings between the administration's bargaining team and the "principals" — upper echelon members of the administration, prior to last Wednesday's session, according to the GAA executive.

When contacted by The Varsity, Parker was reluctant to make any remarks on the progress of negotiations. He said the GAA had recently held a meeting and received a policy directive from its members which would not become clear until a meeting being held today. Parker did say that "the relationship (between the administration and the GAA) is as it was. We're actively discussing proposals and counter-proposals, and negotiations have been at a good level of understanding." He adds, "I feel that we're getting close to a fairly ultimate position with both groups."

The GAA says they are prepared to go to today's meeting willing to listen and to demand answers to more questions. They maintain the hope that bargaining can proceed.

Philo's walk to be blocked

The pastoral pleasure of Philosophers' Walk will be littered with debris and dump trucks for two years of Royal Ontario Museum (ROM) expansion, if the museum's Board of Trustees approves the final planning report, ROM director James Cruise has confirmed.

The tree-lined walkway between Bloor Street and Hoskin Avenue, the object of frequent speculation over the last few years, will be used as the access route to the museum's south courtyard, the site of the first phase of construction.

Cruise, who two years ago termed the path "sacrosanct" and said "not even the view from the Walk would be disturbed," admitted yesterday that during the construction from 1978 to 1980 the path "would certainly be less attractive."

The decision to use Philosophers' Walk was made by ROM's Project Control Group a month ago in conjunction with U of T's Physical Plant Department. Cruise said the museum had earlier planned to seek permission to use an access route coming in from Devonshire Place but that the university "expressed a preference for the route from Hoskin rather than from Devonshire Place."

Cruise said that "in-fill construction" frequently involves difficult access routes. He termed it "unfortunate" that access to the south courtyard was difficult but added that the only other alternative was a "relatively narrow pavement" directly in front of the Edward Johnson Building. Access from Bloor Street was "impossible" he said because of the location of the expansion.

ROM Programs and Public Relations Director David Young, however, said he "can't see how you can come into that part of the museum through Devonshire Place." He also said the Project Control Group communicated with the Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto in arriving at their recommendation.

The route will be designed so as to disturb "as few trees as possible" according to Cruise. He said that when the construction is finished the ROM is responsible for "regrading, resodding and replanting." While he shared everyone else's concern for any damage to the walk, he said, the disruption will have to be looked upon as a "temporary situation."

When asked about the ROM's public hearings on expansion held during the summer, at which a

Students' Administrative Council (SAC) representative was told expansion would have little effect on the university, Brand said that in order for the museum to have "a really good physical building to display the heritage we have" an access route is needed.

"Instead of seeing the ROM," Brand said, "there will be a road with debris. But that has to happen anyway."

York grad union votes for strike

Union entanglements at York University are proceeding apace.

In the largest turnout the York Graduate Assistants Association (GAA) has ever had, a 90 percent strike vote was received by the GAA executive yesterday afternoon.

The union, which has been in a legal position to strike since October 31 of this year, will use this mandate to "strengthen the team's bargaining position" with the administration according to GAA spokesmen.

Conciliation talks broke off between the GAA and the university on September 30. The union intends to take the strike vote to a November 16 meeting with the administration in an attempt to achieve their demands of "major improvements in wages, benefits and job security" according to outgoing GAA president Paul Axelrod.

The administration has offered the union a 6.5 percent increase. The association is asking for an increment from $2,700 to $3,100 (the present U of T rate for graduate assistants).

"Our allowance under the AIB is 10 percent," said Axelrod. "We've come down twice in our salary demands."

The union has a membership of 850, out of which 150 voted at yesterday's meeting. Axelrod said the numbers mean little, since most of the union members are at York only part-time and many are commuting students.

"It's the largest turnout we've ever had," he said. "Don't be deceived by the numbers. We think it's a very solid show of support."

Axelrod specified that at the present time the GAA has no benefits, while other campus unions have total or partial coverage in health care. He also said that the union was raising the issue of quality of education in its demands for a limit on the size of classes for tutorial assistants and part-time lecturers.

Looking for a job with the law?

By JOHN CAMERON

Students interested in working as researchers in the field of criminology will be among the fortunate graduates to find jobs. This was the optimistic portion of the message to a group of about 40 students at the Law-Related "Careertalk" sponsored by the Career Counselling and Placement Centre at the Banting Institute on Monday.

More typical of the current economic situation, however, is the lack of employment in such occupations as probation officer and law clerk, the seminar revealed.

Toronto law clerk Michael Carpenter indicated that "the employment situation is precarious; it is difficult to get started, but maybe you'll get lucky and find a job as a law clerk."

Senior Toronto Probation Officer Glen Brubacher said that "a career as a probation officer is very popular these days" but that "right now the government isn't hiring any probation officers at all because of a freeze on hiring currently in force."

The brighter outlook was given by U of T Criminology Professor Gordon Watson who stated that "there is a recognized need for highly trained researchers in criminology at both the federal and provincial levels." He said the Solicitor-General and Justice Department "are eager to hire such graduates." Watson also indicated that such research positions required a PhD in Criminology.

Brubacher related some of his experiences as a probation officer to impress upon the group that one of the "biggest rewards of his job is working with individuals on a personal basis rather than working with statistics."

He said the minimum requirement for employment as a probation officer is a B.A. but stressed that the most important factor was previous experience in the field of social work. He suggested that people interested in this career could obtain such experience through "working at summer camps, doing volunteer work in the probation service, and applying for summer jobs in the probation service."

Carpenter indicated two basic paths to becoming a law clerk in Ontario. Applicants can enrol in one of the two-year community colleges programs and then try to find a job in a large law firm since the "small law firms still find such courses meaningless." He also suggested employment as a legal secretary as the means to becoming a law clerk. But he made it quite clear that both ways are "extremely difficult at this time."

Carpenter also warned students to be "very wary" of which colleges they attend. He indicated that "the standard at Centennial College is extremely low."

Carpenter did say, though, that there are "correspondence courses in some specialized areas which are run by the Institute of Law Clerks of Ontario and are of excellent quality."

In addition, the Ministry of Colleges and Universities has appointed a commission to evaluate the legal clerk courses offered by the community colleges according to Carpenter. Findings should be available in about six months, he said.

Watson indicated that degrees in criminology are currently available from U of T, "which heavily emphasizes the research aspect" and from the University of Ottawa, "which tends to emphasize more practical aspects." Starting next year, a course will also be available at Carleton he said.

"The part-time program leading to a certificate in criminology from U of T is also quite popular and respected," Watson said.

Exhibition captures spirit of Japanese-Canadian art

By ANDREW MAHON

Japanese Art is alive and well and living in the Macdonald Block.

The art exhibition is the last of the Japanese-Canadian Centennial events and is taking place at the Macdonald gallery in the Macdonald Block on Bay Street.

The exhibition was organized by the Ontario Centennial Exhibition Committee and the National Gallery of Canada. It is one of many cultural events held during 1977 to celebrate the Japanese-Canadian Centennial — the 100th anniversary of the arrival in Canada of the first Japanese immigrants.

"We wanted to get a representative collection of Japanese-Canadian Art," explained Japanese-Canadian Centennial Chairman Mikio Nakamura.

Exhibits range from woodblock prints which reflect traditional Japanese culture, to the more contemporary art form of photography.

Some of the photographs are by a well-known Japanese-Canadian, Shin Sugino. Sugino, who uses unorthodox developing techniques to produce unusual color contrasts in his compositions, studied photo arts at Ryerson Polytechnical Institute.

Other works exhibited include paintings, collages, textiles and floor sculpture. The floor sculptures reflect the spirit of the Japanese rock gardens which use rock and sand as contrasting elements.

"There is an interesting comparison," observed Nakamura, "between the works of Canadian-born and Japanese-born artists. You get a good cross-section from the different backgrounds of all these Japanese-Canadians in this exhibition."

The exhibit features 53 works by 21 artists presently living in Ontario. The works will be on display at the Macdonald gallery until December 4th.

This piece of Japanese art uses steel wool creatively.

New new program comes under fire

By ANDREW MAHON

Dean Desmond Morton of Erindale College and the New New Program appeared before the General Committee of the Faculty of Arts and Science yesterday, but the show didn't go over very well.

Morton came under attack by members of the committee for his proposal to implement the program at Erindale College.

The program, modified by the Dalzell Committee before being presented to some 70 general committee members, calls for all U of T students to take one course from each of the humanities, the natural sciences and the social sciences. Students would also be required to complete two successive courses in a language other than English.

One committee member pointed out that science students in the proposed program would have problems fitting in a large number of introductory courses, since they are usually expected to take at least four first year science courses in physics, math, chemistry and biology.

But there was a more basic problem with the program according to Erindale representative John Doherty.

"My main concern with this program is academic quality," said Doherty. Doherty, who is also student council (SAC) External Affairs Commissioner, was concerned with the "academic resources and facilities" needed to implement the New New Program. "I don't think overcrowding classrooms will benefit the academic quality at Erindale," he concluded.

Morton assured the committee that resources at Erindale "have been assessed." "We determined that students will not be unduly cramped. In fact, I foresee no difficulty at all, he said.

St. Michael's representative Brian O'Riordan suggested that Morton had other motives for the implementation of the program. "I think there's a little political motivation for this proposal," said O'Riordan, citing speeches made by Morton intimating that the New New Program was being used as "window dressing" for Erindale.

Peter Rosenthal, a member from the Mathematics department wanted to know why the New New Program was being introduced at all. "We're adding on requirements as if they would enhance this educational program," said Rosenthal. "Is there some good reason why we need a change of program?"

Morton, in response, stated that the present academic program at U of T was simply not suited to Erindale College. "It (the present program) may be the greatest thing since apple pie, but it's not suited to our needs."

Morton also expressed a hope that the committee would have the courage to "allow a separate campus 20 miles away try something different."

After the meeting, the Erindale dean observed: "It's extraordinary how people don't take the slightest interest in Erindale for 364 days, but show up one day in the year to sneer — I think it's contemptible."

The discussion resumes at the next General Committee meeting on December 5th.

Students prepare for Parrott

By ERIC McMILLAN

A group of students concerned about the new student aid proposals have started a campaign to culminate in a mass action against Harry Parrott, Minister of Colleges and Universities.

The first step in this campaign is the preparation of a pamphlet and participation in the lobby of MPPs sponsored by the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) November 10.

The U of T Student Aid Committee, an ad hoc group meeting in the student council (SAC) offices, will join in the mass lobby this Thursday to "inform MPP's" on student issues including the new loans and grants scheme. Only one voice at the committee meeting yesterday opposed this action on the grounds that it meant "going on our hands and knees" to the government.

John Doherty, student counsellor and OFS executive member, argued: "What we want is for the MPP's to take some position on the student aid program." He said he expects around 70 students from Ontario colleges and universities to take part.

The committee discussed student actions that could be taken when Harry Parrott comes to U of T January 19 to talk to part-time students. Suggestions were made to pack a "meeting" of students into the lobby of Sid Smith, where Parrott will be speaking, to demand that he meet with all students.

Originally the committee hoped Parrott could be induced into visiting this campus before the end of the fall term. Parrott, however, has consistently turned down invitations from SAC and the Graduate Students Union (GSU) to meet with a large number of students as he has at other campuses in Ontario. In October, for example, about 700 students turned out to verbally assault Parrott at Seneca College, a Toronto suburban community college.

The pamphlet is being prepared in conjunction with the GSU and the Association of Part-time University Students (APUS). The pamphlet will deal with regressive aspects of the new student aid plan.

OFS has also prepared a list of questions students could ask their MPPs at the mass lobby. One question demands whether "it is reasonable to expect parents whose taxable income is $10,000 to contribute $1,000 of it to their child for a year of study."

WHO'S SUBVERSIVE?

It has been a persistent claim of the liberal state that all citizens are equal before the law. It has been an equally persistent criticism on the left that legal equality without social equality is at best an illusion. Anatole France put it best perhaps when he interpreted equality before the law to mean that a rich capitalist has as much right to sleep under a bridge as a beggar.

Now the mask is off. Solicitor General Francis Fox told the press on Sunday that the law has to be changed to allow "the commission of certain activities which normally would constitute a Criminal Code offence if brought to light." Or as the Globe & Mail headline for the same story put it: "Fox suggests law change to allow RCMP to conduct illegal acts."

This oddly enough is being suggested as a "solution". Fox has even complained about the reluctance of Parliament to acknowledge the genius of his scheme. The problem, it seems, is that while the RCMP was committing arson, burglary, espionage and all manner of sabotage against a broad spectrum of political groups, there was no document that could be referred to, to legitimize their actions. The tacit assumption here is that illegal acts by RCMP are a service that the government cannot do without. The options open to the government, then, are to either keep RCMP business undercover or else to declare openly that it supports and encourages the RCMP's dirty tricks. Since it has become impossible to cover up the RCMP's activities, the government has opted for the second alternative.

This decision reveals the function of the state and the police better than any metaphysical treatise ever could.

That the government cannot rule without breaking its own laws stems from its role as a defender of social inequality. At some point this inequality inevitably comes into open conflict with the legal equality that the liberal state claims to be its cornerstone. Social inequality breeds resistance against the state and the state finds it necessary to protect itself. The problem is that the state must also protect the image of itself as a fair arbitrator between opposing interests. It must, at one and the same time, to protect the interests of one class and convince the populace that it rules for the benefit of all.

To a large extent the government can protect the interests of its friends through open legislation. It can, for example, pass anti-strike legislation and expropriate land from Native Canadians. It can only do this, however, as long as it can dress up such legislation as a move to protect "public interest."

People are not dumb however. Sooner or later they realize that what has been promoted as the public's interest is in fact the interest of a minority. At that point the government has to resort to illegal methods. In both cases the role of the police is to enforce those measures that maintain the privileges of those in whose interest the government rules.

The history of the RCMP bears

this out. In 1918 (as in 1971) the North-West Mounted Police (NWMP) were entrusted with enforcing the provisions of the War Measures Act, which included a ban on most forms of strike and the registration of some immigrants as "enemy aliens". The following year saw a cavalry unit of the NWMP fighting the Bolsheviks in Russia. Back home the force was instrumental in crushing the Winnipeg General Strike. In 1920 the RCMP proper was created out of a merger between the NWMP and the Dominion Police Force. That same year the government passed Section 98 of the Criminal Code which made it illegal to belong to any organization advocating violent change, a law clearly intended against the Communist Party just then coming into being. August, 1931 saw the application of this law on a large scale. There were 720 arrests that year and 155 of those arrested were convicted under Section 98 and imprisoned.

In the 1930's the RCMP was used to track down and deport immigrants who got out of line. Between 1903 and 1928, 27,660 immigrants were deported. In some cases communists and workers were deported to countries ruled by fascist governments that imprisoned the deportees the moment they landed. The RCMP is currently being used for the same purpose under the provisions of Bill C34.

The activities of the RCMP on Canadian campuses during the 60's are now public knowledge.

The question arising out of all this is: Who are the real subversives? For almost a century now the RCMP and its predecessor the NWMP have been fighting the threat of violence with real violence. It has consistently subverted attempts at working class organization and has been the government's arm in usurping Native Canadian rights and territory.

The protectors of the country, it turns out, are the ones we should be afraid of.

Letters & Opinions

Ukrainians insulted

It is too bad that the Varsity failed to send one of its competent music critics, as was promised, to cover a concert of music by Ukrainian composers performed by students of the Royal Conservatory and Faculty of Music, which took place on October 25 at the Parkdale Library.

Obviously the article which appeared in the Varsity on October 28 under the title "Kick out the perogies" had little in common with music criticism or with informative reporting for that matter. The author who mentions a piano rendition of a modern work as "one of those things that sound like chaos to the untrained ear and will give you a hernia if you try to hum it," but fails to identify the piece, who uses vulgarisms as an adolescent would for shock effect, and who misses the whole point of the concert by calling one of the participants "a token Wasp" could easily be ignored. What cannot be ignored, however, is the ridicule in the article, with a deliberate intent by the author to downgrade the evening and to hurt the performers with personal insult. And this the Varsity cared to print.

I should think that a public apology by the author and by the Varsity to the persons concerned is in order.

The music evening on October 25 consisted of a survey of Ukrainian composers and their works by Zenon Lawryshyn who holds an M.A. from the U of T Faculty of Music and is a composer in his own right. This was followed by Vasyl Sydorenko's piano recital of his own composition "Ukrainian Rhapsody" No. 1. Vasyl also accompanied his sister Halyna in her sopilka rendition of two Ukrainian folk-songs in an arrangement by the outstanding Ukrainian sopilka player Evhen Bobrovnikov. (The young Sydorenkos, 15 and 13 years old respectively, hold an impressive array of prizes and awards among them.) Next in the programme came a piano recital by Marta Vynnytska, a 2nd year Faculty of Music scholarship student, who played "Sonata No. 3" by Xurey Shamo, a contemporary Ukrainian composer living in Montreal. The vocal performance of two songs, Tsetsenko's "Evening Song" and Kos-Anatolsky's "The Rose and the Nightingale" was by the student Victoria Masnyk, accompanied by Cynthia Clark. The concert concluded with a string quartet from the Lysenko Institute of Music playing Barvinsky's Concert in G Minor for strings. The commentator and announcer for the evening was Alla Shklar, a music teacher at De La Salle College. Music consultant for the programme was Mrs. Olena Hilbowych. The concert was supplemented by an exhibit of Ukrainian music literature and special bibliography of Ukrainian musicology. Close to 350 persons attended.

The concert was one of a series of twelve events in the "Ukrainian Heritage" library programme during October at the Parkdale Library. The programme was a joint project between the Toronto Public Library and the Ukrainian Librarians' Association of Canada in cooperation with the Canadian Ukrainian Professional Women's Association. Its purpose was on the one hand, to publicize library resources and services under the slogan "Books in your language" to Ukrainian readers, and on the other hand, to involve the Ukrainian community in acquainting other ethno-cultural groups with aspects of Ukrainian culture in a library setting as a multicultural community centre. As the Coordinator of the "Ukrainian Heritage" programme I will be glad to supply additional information on the concert and other events to those who are interested.

O'Riordan on OSAP

I would like to comment on the article in The Varsity of Friday, Nov. 4, 1977 headed "OSAP Accepted, with Caution". While it is true that at the meeting of the Subcommittee on Admissions and Awards which considered the University's response to the recent OSAP revisions I "objected to the lack of consideration given to several important items," the main thrust of my argument against the proposed response was along the following lines:

a) that the response was not strong enough given the very destructive nature of the revisions proposed.

b) that the response seemed to accept some of the more disadvantageous concepts of the revisions advanced by the government — in particular in this regard the administration's response only went so far as to urge the government to increase the number of grant eligibility periods rather than challenging the whole concept of having such periods, will surely result in many professional students and graduate students being totally cut off from grant assistance at a time in their academic careers when such assistance is most needed.

Gay is natural

I would like to commend Gerald Hannon on his brilliant argument for the protection of homosexual's rights, as reported in last Friday's Varsity. In support of homosexuality he stated that it is a perfectly natural thing, since certain "bird populations on the Pacific coast have been observed forming homosexual pairings, and some researchers have reported observing incidents of homosexual rape among earthworms."

I did some research, and found that minks eat their young when threatened. Therefore, on the basis of Hannon's argument, to eat your young is a perfectly natural thing to do, and we should uphold the rights of those who practice this.

I believe that human beings have been given a few responsibilities. Obviously, we are responsible not to eat our young. Also, I feel we are responsible to be a man or a woman. Of course, if you think you only hold as much status and responsibility as an earthworm...

More Opinions

More pragmatism, fewer expenses instead of SAC fee increases

The letter from Mr. Robertson in last Monday's Varsity ("SAC's Deficit Not Erases (sic) Cutbacks") has presented a rather one-sided view of the Students' Administrative Council financial position. He has described the organization as healthy and growing and at a point in time when a hard decision must be made between curtailing some programmes and increasing the student fee. For him, the choice is obvious: increase the student fee.

My involvement with our student council has led me to some altogether different conclusions. The SAC does not suffer from a lack of necessary funds but it does suffer from an inability to decide its priorities within its budget and from an unwillingness to stick to its budget once it is set. The problem is compounded by a lack of financial leadership on the part of Mr. Robertson.

What SAC requires is not a student fee increase, but a realignment of thinking toward providing more useful support for students, with as little overhead expense as possible. Growth must be redefined within the organization to exclude any more administrative overburden if the council is to see itself clear of its present difficulties.

An examination of the growth in executive salaries of the council can serve as an illustration of SAC's difficulties. Three years ago, during the council year 1975-1976, the executive members of the organization drew salaries totalling $11,544. In the present year, the budget for executive salaries is $18,680 and that amount has already been spent. The council will require a total of more than $22,000 in that account by the end of the year. Where has all the money gone? An examination of the financial records showed that five people have drawn more than $1,800 each and that in the month of September, when all executive members but the President were back in classes, five members of the executive drew salary, including Mr. Robertson. It was even shown that Mr. Robertson wasn't on this campus during one week he was being paid.

Another area of deep concern is the amount of money spent on student council conferences in the present year. The itinerary includes Charlottetown, Winnipeg, New Orleans, Guelph, Hamilton, and Calgary. For those who go on these conferences, they are a very fun time, but for the rest of us, they are a drain of more than $10,800 in the present year. A few weeks ago seven council members jetted to Calgary for a national students meeting. The results of that conference were minimal and certainly didn't justify the $3,800 increase over last year's conference expense and the jump from the $3,200 conference cost in 1975-1976.

I could also turn toward the staff salaries expenses as another example of overexpenditure resultant from a lack of clearly defined financial priorities. Two years ago, there were 6 staff members in the SAC office. Presently there are 9. The extra staff have not been applied to the services end of the council's operation, for there is still only one services coordinator. The extra staff have been laid on at the administrative level.

So where is all this growth Mr. Robertson talks about? It is in the administrative and overhead expenses of council, not in hugely increased services spending. Services account for only 35 percent of the SAC budget. The dramatic increase in service programmes has only occurred because the people involved with services have gotten more value for their dollars. It is certainly time Mr. Robertson directed the council toward the same goal instead of irresponsibly rambling on about increasing the mandatory student council fee.

What deficit?

As an oh-so-humble employee of the great and beneficent corporation SAC, I must make apology. Oh bosses, wherever ye be! This most unworthy supplicant names it for no ill: the mighty move in strange ways.

The givers of the Roam-around (and producer of the holy parchment upon which my ejaculations are reproduced) are bountiful. Although the granary is empty — the seven lean years are now upon us — we are still being fed. And what you are feeding us!

This most unworthy Beethoven freak does not deign to question the wisdom of sinking funds into the people's entertainment, the Rock. And in truth, is it not written "He who pays APUS should not open his mouth to the higher SAC order?"

So spread your Voices, even through the air, and in Electromagnetic radiation. Revive the Output of Input, get the third floor of your media building working. For, if you can bring wine from the Rock, and feed the multitude, you can certainly balance an overspent budget.

I know though. That's why I trust that You know.

Gay rights basic

The most recent Hart House Debate on the resolution "that the rights of homosexuals ought to be guaranteed by law" is another one of the grim jokes which the university plays from time to time under the guise of fostering discussion on important, controversial topics.

The grim or should I say obscene character of the whole affair lay in the implicit assumption by all participants that the civil liberties of a group of individuals, who seek nothing more than the freedom to live in accordance with responsible choices, are in fact subject to debate, and therefore alienable.

Rational argumentation

At first I thought that Mario Cutajar was confused. However, his response to my letter made it quite clear that his purpose in writing on terrorism is deliberately to obfuscate and to mislead through employing the techniques of incoherence and illogicality and using language meaninglessly. As such his writings must be considered as perverse exercises in purposeful deception.

4. Cutajar is deliberately dishonest, deceptive and mendacious when he purposefully misrepresents what my letter said in what gives to the reader the appearance of paraphrase or perhaps even quotation. He writes, "Unless reason can tell us that an action is good or bad prior to it being undertaken, writes Taylor, there is no basis for 'truth'." If I wrote this why did Cutajar not put it in quotes? Because I never wrote it!! This statement is not even a paraphrase of my position. Truth is not dependent on morally good or bad actions. I would, however, maintain that unless reason could provide us with some indication of whether our actions are good or bad prior to the action being undertaken, the notion of moral culpability would be empty. But that is the position of Cutajar who believes that at this point in human history reason has not yet been "called upon to rule over human affairs." See 2 above.

5. Cutajar claims that my use of reference to the Nazis is an example of my appeal to emotionalism. Consider the logic, or rather illogic of Cutajar's statement,

If the Nazi atrocities seem immoral despite their historical context it is because even before they ever took place it could be foreseen that they would never contribute to human happiness. One did not have to wait for history's judgement because one could foresee it.

Too bad the Nazis were unable to foresee it in the way that Cutajar "foresees" it now in 1977. At any rate, again note the contradiction with what is said about the period of "prehistory" in the quotation in 2 above. (All this is really too much for a rational human being to bear!)

6. Cutajar accuses me of equivocating when I wrote, "Murder, be it on behalf of oppressed masses or for the sake of the wealthy few, is wrong." But what word is it that Cutajar claims I equivocated on? "Murder"? "Murder" for the masses is not murder? Or is it "wrong"? Cutajar is altogether unclear here. And as if to emphasize his own incoherence and meaningless use of language, Cutajar then provides us with an unambiguous example of equivocation in his statement, "But sometimes pacifism entails the murder of others." This is equivocation pure and simple. But perhaps Cutajar is a mystic and hence above meaning and coherence.

In conclusion, however, I would like to make it clear that I am not a capitalist. Thus, even given Cutajar's incoherence, it is perhaps doubly correct to say that I "should be rehabilitated rather than shot." Try rational argumentation. I am quite willing to be, "rehabilitated" that way.

Poor Mario may shoot you, if his propaganda fails

Poor Mario Cutajar! No matter how hard he tries to get his point across, people insist on misunderstanding him. No doubt this incapacity to communicate has played a role in the loss of faith in him experienced by a contingent of Varsity staff members who took part in an unsuccessful coup recently.

One may well wonder why Cutajar bothers to keep explaining his position on terrorism. As he himself has so profoundly and articulately told us, language has degenerated to such an extent that it "trivializes all thought." ("Such violence," Oct. 19). If language has been so "deprived of its critical faculty," why does Cutajar insist on using it?

I suspect that Cutajar is a crusader for a language that is not yet dead. If he is trying to reawaken in us the capacity for understanding and using intelligent, reasoned discourse, it is essential for us to study his own writings carefully.

This consideration is bolstered by one of the major facts that Cutajar has repeatedly stressed: revolutionaries tend to turn to violence when obtuse people like us fail to get the message. He claims at the present not to favor violence, but not on the grounds that it is intrinsically immoral. Rather, "Patient organizing and persistent propaganda... are ultimately more effective." ("Such violence.") This is a criterion of convenience and utility, not of morality. If his repeated attempts at propaganda fail to bring forth fruit, it is very possible Mario could change his mind on this issue, and any of us could be the next people to be shot. After all, "Revolutionaries... want to make life worth living but find that achieving this will involve taking the life of their enemies. And their enemies are not only those who consciously oppose them but also those whose actions inadvertently help the enemy. If you are not for the revolution you are against it." ("Such violence.")

Think on this! Remember it if

Mario or one of his fellow-travellers comes to see you with a warm gun! Don't say that he and I didn't warn you! To Richard Taylor's unequivocal assertion (somehow Cutajar sees this to be an equivocation, paradoxically enough) that murder is wrong, what does Mario reply? "Perhaps." PERHAPS! ("Existentialism and terrorism", Nov. 2.)

Cutajar distinguishes the hijacking of a Lufthansa jet and the murder of its pilot from the murder of a German industrialist. "The first is an instance of random terror that no genuine revolutionary could condone. The second is terror directed at a specific, high-ranking agent of capitalism... One cannot condemn it on moral grounds." ("Existentialism and terrorism.") On what grounds is he able to condemn the hijacking and murder of the pilot? Moral ones? Nonsense! He has no moral grounds except that a good act is one that furthers the revolution. No, what seems to really bother Cutajar is the "randomness" of the hijacking. But what can he mean by "randomness"? Surely the hijackers intended their act to further the goals of the revolution! After all, one of their intentions was to free some of their fellow-revolutionaries from the coop, so that these latter could rejoin the fight. And is not Lufthansa one of capitalism's agents? And what of its pilots, who make quite a hefty salary? If "capitalism" is clever enough to employ agents to do its dirty work of oppression and exploitation how do you distinguish the high-ranking from the low-ranking agents? And for what purpose? The privates are the enemy just as much as the generals. Why not kill them all?

Cutajar tells us, "to condemn Nazi atrocities is easy. It requires little thought as to the basis of one's moral revulsion." ("Existentialism and terrorism") Well, then, give us at least the little thought it takes! Think! What is the basis of our moral revulsion at the Nazi atrocities?

Cutajar says it is a morality "based on one's personal emotions and little else." What is this "little else"? Perhaps it's an ethic based on the absolute worth of every human person.

But we have received a new truth from Cutajar which overthrows such an old-fashioned morality. Unlike an ethic based on existence, and the absolute worth of the person because he exists, Cutajar's revolutionary ethics is abstract, which is to say that it is removed from reality (How ironic that the word "existentialism" appears in the headline of his latest piece; Cutajar's is a perfect example of an existence-less "morality"). He attacks a "capitalism" which doesn't exist for its all-pervasive oppression, claiming (not proving) that it allows no individual escape, endowing it with conscious motives and the employing of "agents" to carry out its will. His new morality is based on a world which cannot exist, his utopian dream of a world without oppression. Without offering a picture of this world, and without offering any proof that the "revolution" can achieve this situation in which a "reason" which belongs to no one will "rule over" (without oppressing?) human affairs, Cutajar nonetheless allows this abstract and glorious vision in his mind to justify the murder of concrete, existing human beings.

Cutajar has told us, "Most of what one reads or hears today, from Eaton's commercials to political declarations, is purposefully vacuous. To indulge in metaphysical stupidity, to string words together for no other reason than that they make statements which mimic profundity is nowadays considered a mark of high intellect." ("Such violence.") Cutajar says much to indicate that he is highly intelligent. But this statement is perhaps the only things he says which is true. Use it as a key to interpret the rest.

Daniel S. Utrecht

That it is impossible to judge human actions without reference to their historical significance is itself a historical judgement. It is that we live in what Marx called "prehistory": a world within which individuals make history in ignorance of the actions of others. Their collective actions consequently appear as an alien force over which they have no control. The irrationality which this condition introduces into human events prevents the application of reason to human actions to the degree that the significance of such events becomes apparent only after a period of time. It is the aim of revolutionaries to end this condition and make it possible for human beings to make history in solidarity with each other. At that point reason can be called upon to rule over human affairs. History will have lost its oppressive character.

3. Cutajar also says I have ignored a moral dilemma. What dilemma? "The end demands means of achieving it but the means define the end," writes Cutajar. If the end or goal is perhaps the treatment of each human being as an end in himself (true humanism), this end is not achieved by treating some (or all) human persons as means until the magical dawn of some new era of reason in human affairs. To modify slightly but to alter significantly Cutajar's otherwise irrational and deceitful remark, the morality of the means defines the morality of the end and the moral end demands moral means of achieving it. I need not draw this out further. Cutajar's

"Is housing a problem and who says so?"

By ROBERTA CLARE

The housing problem in Toronto is an unprecedented phenomenon, according to William Michelson, U of T sociology professor and Director of the Child and the City Research Project, at a lecture in the Innis Town Hall Friday afternoon. The lecture was one of nine in a series "The Urban Revolution" presented by the Lunch and Learn Club of the School For Continuing Studies.

Michelson, the author of Man and His Urban Environment (1970) and Environmental Choice, Human Behavior and Residential Satisfaction (1977), claimed that Toronto practises the highest planning and environmental standards in the world. Fairly low vacancy rates (a stimulus for builders), accessible capital and a considerable amount of suitable land for building should present reasonable building conditions, he said. Renovations, upgrading and various types of buildings contribute to an "urban environment that is not sterile," Michelson added.

Michelson examined the local perspective thoroughly: "Why is housing a problem in Toronto and who says so?"

The middle class, Michelson reported, complains that they are "getting less housing for a higher price." Young people are concerned that the housing options their parents had will not be accessible to them, he continued. "The housing officials are also upset," he stated.

Such problems as the availability of schools and social services have arisen due to the high density of families in the suburbs, Michelson explained. He added that the builders complain that it is no longer a profitable business. They claim that the factors behind the high cost of housing "are out of the hands of those immediately involved."

Michelson stated that the problem is a qualitative question of "price and type." "Freedom is a critical element," he maintained.

During 1969-1975 Michelson undertook a study to examine the "who and where phenomenon of birds of a feather flock together." Approximately 761 families who intended to move to apartments or houses were interviewed four times.

twice before and after their moves. These people although not newlyweds were of child-bearing age and in secure financial position. Their expectations and activities for housing were also carefully considered when their individual situations were analysed, Michelson related. The study revealed that most of the apartment dwellers who were "relatively affluent expressed satisfaction with their lives but were not as happy as those who moved into their own homes," Michelson reported. "They expressed satisfaction if they thought they weren't going to stay and considered the apartments a 'stepping home' " he added. Their contentment was based on things of "low value" such as swimming pools.

"But those who thought their aspirations for the ideal housing situation had been blocked judged from a different set of criteria," such as the possibility of renovations and the problem of privacy, Michelson revealed. In fact, no matter how comfortable the units appeared to be, these people were unhappy with the overall housing conditions, he added. He concluded that those who were happiest were those whose aspirations had been fulfilled.

The high percentage of building years took place over the last fifteen years lies at the heart of the housing problem, Michelson said. "Speculation occurs by the realtors, the builders and ourselves," he stated. He explained that housing costs are based on supply and demand.

Michelson queried, "Are we entitled to pocket the money the market will bring?" He reminded the audience that every seller of a house wants a profit whether or not the increase over the original cost is legitimate.

The specific problem in Toronto was illustrated. A builder was selling houses in Toronto for $74,000 which had originally cost $42,000 to build on land which had been purchased 20 years earlier. In justifying his profit the builder replied, "The guy down the street is selling his houses for $74,000." He added that he was currently building more apartments than houses because fewer families can afford $74,000.

A member of the audience interjected that the high cost of housing has further economic ramifications: "Those who intend to buy are saving, not consuming."

Although such measures as easier terms, subsidiaries and tax deductions attempt to lighten the financial burden of buying a home, "there have been no steps taken to curtail the price," Michelson charged. "Because of the loop-holes and the low rates of the speculation tax and the foreign investment tax," these laws have had little effect in easing the housing problem, Michelson concluded.

Hooper house powered by sun

By TOM KUHN

A professor who has been "talking to walls" for years about his solar energy ideas is now working with large government grants and speaking before large audiences.

Professor Frank Hooper spoke to more than 150 people about the increasing use of solar energy in the near future. The occasion was the second of the Sesquicentennial Lectures sponsored by the School of Continuing Studies.

Hooper pointed to the success of the large solar-powered house he designed, subsidized by both U.S. and Canadian governments.

"Provident House", located in North Toronto has a market value near $250,000 with $45,000 in solar energy equipment and data-collecting instruments. Provident House utilizes what Hooper calls annual storage of solar energy.

Annual storage of solar energy is Hooper's answer to the problem of the difference in sunlight between high latitude northern climates and those closer to the equator. Provident House demonstrates that by storing large amounts of solar energy in the summer months, solar heating systems can be maintained throughout the year, even during the coldest months, Hooper said.

The difference between the solar energy of Toronto and Miami, Hooper said, is only 15 percent. A problem arises because the period of the year with lowest solar energy in northern climates coincides with the period of greatest need, in the months of December and January.

By placing solar collectors (glass panes through which water or air is circulated, heated and returned to a tank in the basement for storage) on the roof of a building, people can reduce their dependence on fossil fuels in the near future, Hooper said.

Hooper who is in the process of constructing a senior citizens' complex with solar energy, and has a twenty-two storey office building also planned, said solar energy will in the near future be more profitable than fossil fuels for large structures, given the escalating cost of fossil fuels.

The exhaustion of fossil fuels, which will reach their peak production in the 1990's requires that alternate energy sources be seriously considered, said Hooper.

Solar energy, he insists, is the only new energy form now considered which is in any way immediately practicable.

Exhibiting a graph of oil production from 1900 to 2100, Hooper declared that one-third of all energy production is now used for transportation, one-third for space heating, and one-third for other uses.

Solar energy could be used both economically and practically to meet the space heating proportion of energy use. Hooper speculated that 10 percent of energy needs will be met by solar energy by the turn of the century.

American government aid has been substantial, said Hooper. He pointed out that the practicality of solar heating in Canada should be an incentive for Canadian government support of research in the field too.

Solar power can be our friend if we learn to use it right. It is the only practicable new energy source, says professor.

Sit-in threat succeeds

A show of strength from two sectors of York University has seen the university administration back down on its original demands.

A sit-in occupation of the Osgoode Hall Law Library planned by Osgoode Hall students for last Friday to protest curtailed weekend hours forced university officials to maintain regular library services.

The shortened hours, proposed by York as a measure of financial restraint, were the subject of a meeting held last Wednesday between law students and three university vice-presidents.

Osgoode Hall Legal and Literary Society President Carol Beckman argued that the savings made would be "miniscule, picayune". The determination of the students forced the administration's hand, legal students said, and the library was kept open.

A strike by the York University Staff Association (YUSA) was narrowly averted on Friday when YUSA representatives met with the administration under mediator Jean Read. A collective bargaining agreement was reached hours before the deadline. The association was asking for a wage package of 13.5 percent or $1,350 but accepted a package of 7 percent or $700, 50 percent of a dental plan and sick leave for a sick child among the major items.

Campus as campus centre: Maybe this time?

By Mark Lukasiewicz

The Campus as Campus Centre project, first proposed six years ago, may be revived at a meeting of the Governing Council's Committee of Planning and Resources on November 21. The committee will decide whether to recommend to Governing Council that it reverse a ruling made two years ago which halted all development of the plan.

The Governing Council ruling required that the building portion of the project, known as the "bazaar" be totally self-financed. This restriction came after four years of intensive lobbying, planning and architectural design work. Although the project had been approved in principle by the Governing Council, and although it was — and remains — third on the university's capital priorities spending list (behind Innis College, now completed, and the athletic complex, now under construction), the Governing Council ruled that it would spend no money on the project.

Student Governor Michael Treacy, who proposed the motion to remove the no net cost requirement from the project, believes that the university should stand by its priorities list and devote the needed funds to build the "bazaar" south of the Sidney Smith Building.

Treacy says that it is unrealistic to expect the Campus as Campus Centre "bazaar" to pay for itself, since it includes large student lobby and lounge areas, which generate no revenue. He also notes that the expected cost of the project to the university would be — at a maximum — $50,000 per year, a "paltry sum" when compared to the millions spent on other building projects on campus.

SAC vice-president Dave Jones is coordinating SAC's efforts to gain acceptance for the Campus as Campus Centre proposal. Though the plan is now six years old, he says "this project is by no means a dead issue. We intend to get a strong show of student support for this motion."

Jones terms the no-net-cost principle "unprecedented" and notes that in order for the building to be self-financing, large student lounge and meeting areas — for which the building was primarily designed — would have to be removed, and more commercial space added. (An objection raised also by the Presidential Advisory Committee on Campus as Campus Centre.)

Jones: "not a dead issue."

Last Proposal Dumped

The last complete proposal for a campus centre came before Governing Council (then the Board of Governors) in the late sixties. The building was a massive structure to be located south of McLennan Physical Labs on St. George St. Designs for the building were in the final stages when the Board of Governors delayed for almost a year a decision between two bids from the Bank of Montreal and the Bank of Commerce, both of whom wanted banking rights in the new building.

Even though the Bank of Montreal's bid was more than double that of the Bank of Commerce, and fifty per cent higher than what had been expected as a maximum bid, the Board of Governors inexplicably waited until both banks withdrew their longstanding bids. A student referendum in early 1970 reaffirmed overwhelming student support for the project, and even indicated a strong willingness of the part of students to pay a $15 per year levy to cover the deficit caused by the withdrawal of the bank bids.

Nonetheless, plans for the building ran into difficulties with city bylaws, and the Board of Governors, clearly unenthusiastic about the project, devoted their energies to bylaw exemptions for the new Roberts Library and not the campus centre. By 1971, the campus centre proposal was dead.

SAC president Tom Faulkner, bitter over the "eleventh hour" defeat of what he and others considered an excellent proposal, wrote a long and scathing letter to the Varsity, condemning the Board of Governors for their actions and revealing some of the sinister dealings which brought the decision. (For excerpts of his letter, see box this page).

SAC Begins Again

By the spring of 1971, the Students' Administrative Council decided to begin again the long process of planning a campus centre. In May of that year, SAC commissioned a group from the faculty of Architecture to study the need for a campus centre and to draw up plans to meet those needs.

The result of this group's efforts

If at first you don't succeed

Theology student Tom Faulkner was SAC president during 1966-1967 and 1967-1968. His letter, excerpted below, was written to the Varsity following the failure of the campus centre proposal to which he and others had devoted so much time and energy. It betrays the bitterness and frustration he felt.

... The situation as I went into my second term as SAC President in September 1967 was: (1) John Andrews had completed preliminary drawings and was into working drawings for the Campus Centre. His drawings had been applauded by numerous other architects as certain to bring some distinction to our undernourished campus architecture. President Bissell (former U of T president Claude Bissell) has seen and approved the work.

(2) University Minister (Bill) Davis had reviewed the Centre, applauded it, and granted 50 percent of the 4 million dollars cost. This was slightly more than he was obligated by past practise to provide since the figure included cost of furnishings.

(3) The U of T Board of Governors had informally assured us that it would come up with one-half to three-quarters of a million dollars towards the Centre.

(4) It was assumed that a bank would grant no more than one-half to one million dollars prepaid rent for a branch in the Centre and exclusive rights on campus. Bids would be called for by the SAC and the highest bid would be sent to the Board for approval. By this means it was hoped that the Board would be spared the embarrassment of choosing a bank at a time when several banks were represented on the Board.

(5) Students would pay the balance of the capital costs plus operating expenses.

(6) The City of Toronto chose this moment to enforce zoning bylaws regarding setback from the street which they had never before enforced strictly on the university. The new stringency affected the campus centre and the new (Robarts) library. Though we were prepared to redesign the Centre if need be to comply, for some reason the Board of Governors was never able to persuade the city to let us proceed with the Centre. They did, however, manage to proceed with the new library.

However the most interesting events concerned the bank bids for space in the Centre. In the end, only two banks bid: the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce (CIBC) and the Bank of Montreal (B of M). The B of M made the best bid by far: a prepaid lease of one and two-thirds million dollars.

When we informed the Board of the B of M offer, we received only a brief written acknowledgement of its receipt. . . . The following difficulties were communicated, or "filtered" to the SAC by the Office of the President.

(1) The Board wanted to withdraw its previous offer of exclusive privileges on campus to the best bid. The B of M, quite generously and in my view unnecessarily, agreed to limit its exclusive right to parts of the present St. George campus.

(2) The Board felt that the B of M wanted too much space. The architect, however, was pleased both with the amount of space requested and its proposed use.

(3) The Board implied that the B of M was taking advantage of us in a cold and mercenary way. To us, the B of M's style was quite the reverse, and in addition their bid was, as one Simcoe Hall man said, "ridiculously high."

(4) The Board asked if we would open bids again, this time to the B of M and CIBC alone. We replied, rather loudly, "No!" The agreement had been that these were the final bids, and the B of M just as likely would reduce theirs if given the chance.

(5) The Board questioned the soundness of our investment policies. I suggest that anyone who suspects Dominion Securities of being frivolous in their investment policies is being just plain silly.

The B of M finally got tired after eight months with no reply to their offer and, I assume, their offer is now dead. The delay, the efforts to duck previous commitments, and the final stalling of the Campus Centre by the Board of Governors assume a sinister lunge in light of four facts. If two plus two equals innuendo, here it is:

(a) There were in 1967 more CIBC Directors represented on the U of T Board than there were B of M Directors. Among them was Chairman Henry Borden. (Among them also was Sidney Hermant, who remains on Governing Council.)

(b) The CIBC has always been the banker for the University of Toronto.

(c) It was hinted to us by the Office of the President that the Board was dragging its feet on the Centre proposals because it was displeased with the SAC's attitude on reform of the University. (eg. radical changes in the Board itself.)

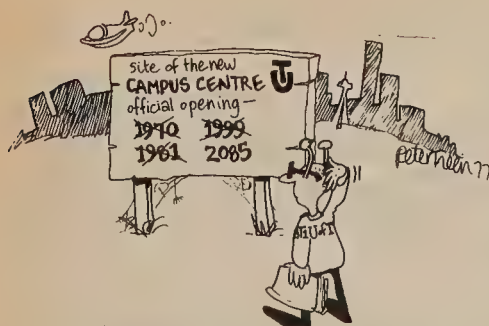

I dislike innuendo, but the circumstantial evidence is such that I have grave doubts as to the Board's good faith in the affair of the Campus Centre. You can make of the situation what you will; in my opinion, the University unnecessarily lost a fine building, the students unfairly lost a good deal of money, and the B of M was treated in a rather shabby fashion.

Yours Sincerely,
Tom Faulkner

This model of the campus as campus "green" which would replace Huron fountain, and walkways. The "ba-

vargfeature

was the "Campus as Campus Centre" proposal, which won acclaim in architectural circles for its originality and design. The first recommendation of the group was that no single "campus centre" be built. Rather, the report proposed extensive upgrading of the campus itself, to provide the "educational terrain" and city-within-a-city atmosphere the campus clearly lacked.

The greatest problem area was clearly the region south of Harbord St. and west of St. George St. Built up in the rapid post-war expansion of the university, this sector remains a hodgepodge of buildings with no central plan or theme.

Ramsey Wright, Sidney Smith, Lash Miller and McLennan Physical are four of the university's most extensively used buildings. They sit in a row along St. George St., and were designed and built with almost no provision for lounge space, green space, or service facilities such as restaurants, banks, stores, etc. . . .

The Campus as Campus Centre report urged that this area be the first to receive attention. It urged the closure of Wilcocks St. between St. George and Spadina, and the closure of Huron between Russell and Harbord Streets. This would mean that the area bounded by Harbord, St. George, Russell and Spadina would be closed to all vehicular traffic, and the former streets would largely be landscaped to form part of a "green".

The proposal also urged that a "bazaar" facility be built on the east side of Sidney Smith. This facility would house large lounge areas, a pub, bookstore, bank, and food outlets. St. George St., according to the plan, would be reduced to two lanes, and angle parking on either side would increase parking capacity along the street. The street would also be landscaped into a "promenade."

The Campus as Campus Centre proposal was to a large extent an extension of "Infill," a concept first suggested by a graduate student in Architecture. The earlier proposal consisted in "filling in" the spaces between campus buildings in the southwest sector — by building enclosed walkways, stores and shops, parks, lounge areas and additional green space.

This is the proposed site of the bazaar phase.

Throughout the school year of 1971 and 1972, SAC lobbied vigorously for acceptance of the Campus as Campus Centre proposal. A large display area was built on the east side of Sidney Smith to promote the idea, and efforts were made to gain the plan's acceptance at the Governing Council level.

Results!

By late 1972 the SAC lobbying and student support began to show results. The university placed a "student area" third on its list of capital spending priorities, behind Innis College and the new athletic complex. In 1973, U of T President John Evans struck a Presidential Advisory Committee to discuss the Campus as Campus Centre proposal and to recommend action.

On November 26, 1973 the Committee recommended that the project be approved in principle, and that $90,000 be allocated for the completion of design drawings of phase I of the project, which would include landscaping in the Huron-Wilcocks area and the construction of the Sid Smith bazaar.

In April 1974, the university and SAC hired ARCO Planning Consultants to develop the concepts proposed in the original Campus as Campus Centre study. ARCO's report recommended some changes in the original design, but left the fundamental concept intact. The bazaar section, originally planned for the St. George side of Sid Smith, was now to be located on the south side of the building, on Wilcocks St.

Finally, one week later on December 18, 1974, the Governing Council approved in principle the Campus as Campus Centre, and the development of Phase I. It noted, however, that the bridge financing of $1.5 million fell short of the projected cost of the project by $750,000.

In January of 1975, a "users committee," consisting of the Presidential Advisory Committee on Campus as Campus Centre and others, was established to seek means of financing the additional $750,000 needed to begin the project. In March of that year, Lavenhol and Horwath were retained by the university to do market research with respect to the Bazaar phase of the project.

On June 23, 1975, the axe fell. Acting on a recommendation from the administration, the Internal Affairs Committee suggested that the "bazaar" be built only on the understanding that it be completely self-financing. The Business Affairs Committee, noting that Lavenhol and Horwath's studies indicated the bazaar would have a $50,000 per year deficit, recommended the immediate suspension of development of the project. The plan was halted.

Bitter and Frustrated

The abrupt termination of planning for the Campus as Campus Centre left student leaders bitter and frustrated. Once again, a plan for student services had suffered a last-minute setback at Governing Council.

This group of buildings along Huron St. are part of the problem.

Reasons for the sudden implementation of the "no net cost" restriction are not clear. The provision was contradictory, in that it represents the university's refusal to devote funds to a project now first on its capital spending priorities list.

Jack Dimond, executive assistant to the vice-president of Internal Affairs, maintains that the no net cost principle is not unprecedented. He says that all parking lots and university residences, for example, are expected to operate on a break-even basis. He admits, however, that not all residences succeed on this core.

Simond says that the administration will not support the motion to remove the no net cost restriction, because many of the services to be housed in the bazaar would be available in the proposed "southwest campus development."

The "southwest campus development," recently proposed by the southwest campus task force, is only in preliminary planning stages, and according to Treacy, is "at least six years down the road". Treacy notes that student space has been promised, but never delivered, in other buildings. Treacy adds, "When you look at the number of people crowded into the Sid Smith lobby at noon, you know we need something . . . something more than just 'space' in the southwest development."

SAC president John Tuzyk is also firmly committed to the success of Treacy's motion. Tuzyk notes how small the needed commitment from Governing Council would be when compared to the cost of other projects. Further, he points to the "thousands of dollars" spent by SAC over the years, in commissioning, promoting and designing the project.

Treacy points out that the abandonment of the no-net cost principle would not necessarily require the university to pay the total outstanding cost. UPDATE has placed campus as campus centre on its list, and private contributions are being solicited. In addition, the deficit of $50,000 per year was calculated on the basis of admittedly conservative revenue estimates.

While the need for the campus as campus centre has never been questioned, it appears the administration is now trying to promote the still vague "southwest campus development" as an alternative to it; this in spite of the fact that no approval has been given to the southwest project.

Although the administration is clearly opposed to any university funding of the campus as campus centre "bazaar" student leaders are determined not to allow a replay of the 1969 "eleventh hour" defeat of the student centre proposal. Treacy's motion will likely gain strong support among students, and the Presidential Advisory Committee on campus as campus centre has also voiced its support.

Treacy expects his motion to pass at the Committee of Planning and Resources. If Governing Council were to concur with such a decision, the campus as campus centre would be a reality in a few years.

But SAC does not intend to leave the Governing Council decision to chance. An intensive poster, petition and information campaign will commence this week.

C.A.C.C. MEETING TO TAKE PLACE NOV. 21st

"The University of Toronto is an institution with responsibility for over 50,000 people's lives . . . 'A city within a city' — yet it is unable or unwilling to satisfy most of the requirements of such a population." — Campus As Campus Centre Study, Department of Architecture, University of Toronto.

November 21st is the big day.

At 4:00 o'clock the Planning and Resources Committee of the Governing Council of the University of Toronto will meet to decide the fate of the Campus As Campus Centre Project. At this meeting, which will be held in the Governing Council Chamber in Simcoe Hall, the committee will consider a motion calling for the removal of the self-financing restriction of Phase I of the project. This self-financing restriction is the sole hold up of the project. If it is removed, Campus As Campus Centre will be underway.

The University of Toronto is deficient in basic service facilities taken for granted at almost every other major university. It is up to all of us to attend this meeting. Show the Planning and Resources Committee that Campus As Campus Centre is vitally important to the students at the U of T.

Make sure we get the idea across to the Governing Council that students at the U of T want more food outlets, more lounge space, more walkways, more games rooms, more grassy spots: make sure they know students at the U of T want Campus As Campus Centre to start now.

The meeting on November 21st will be where it's all decided. Don't let five years of work go down the drain . . . fill the hall!

ONE MORE DAY TO GO

There may still be time to get involved in Lobby Day planned for tomorrow, November 10th. Contact the SAC Office immediately to find out how you can help in coming together with people from throughout Ontario to meet directly with Legislators at Queen's Park.

It appears from occasional lack of government response, that M.P.s and Cabinet Members may not be fully aware of some of the problems that university and college students face. Lobby Day was designed to organize people to get the student point of view across most effectively: by person to person contact. Lobby Day also gives students a chance to see how lawmakers act and function and what the legislative process is all about.

The President of the Students' Administrative Council, John Tuzyk, will be leading folks over to Queen's Park after gathering tomorrow morning. Get buzzing over to SAC today so we know that you want to get involved.

Queen's Park: Ever Wonder What Goes On Inside?

BARGAIN SKI PLANS

Last year SAC brought over 2,000 people to ski during the SAC Ski Days and this year we hope to take even more people out to have some fun in the snow.

The backbone of the SAC Ski Programmes are the weekday trips every Thursday and Friday in January (so as to take advantage of the best snow conditions) and every Friday thereafter in February and March. Ski Day fun continues until March 17th, snow conditions permitting.

Mountains are not the only things that seem to continue to go up. There has been an increase in this year's cost to $11.95 per day, which is due to a rise in the prices charged us.

The first trip is planned for Friday January 6th. Buses will be leaving from in front of the SAC Office and then we'll be off to Blue Mountain where there is a verticle drop of 750 feet. Advance reservations can be made now by all fee paying U of T students at any of the five SAC ticket outlets.

Also available now are tickets for the giant, once in a lifetime Christmas trip, December 27th to January 1st, when we'll be heading out to Mt. Ste. Marie in Quebec. This almost unbelievable Christmas fun costs only $199.00 per person, which includes breakfast and dinner daily. A $50.00 deposit will reserve your space on the extravagance, as will a minimum downpayment of $6.95 secure a place for you on any of the weekday trips. The remaining $5.00 will be collected on the bus.

Three more, weeklong trips are planned throughout the season. Be sure to ask about the run we plan to take down to Aspen, Colorado, or the trip planned for Smuggler's Notch in Vermont.

Blue Mountain has two large cafeteria-style restaurants that are both fully licensed. There is a ski rental shop where your U of T SAC status could entitle you to 45 percent savings. Lodge space could be sought out at the base of the mountain or in town just three short miles down the road.

On three Fridays during the coming season, SAC Ski Freaks will head out to the Georgian Peaks in Collingwood to watch the U of T men's and women's ski team race against other universities. It may seem early, but winter will be upon us before you think it possible. So get those toques and mittens ready, because SAC Ski Days will be here again, putting you right in the middle of the action. Another breathtaking SAC Service.

Getting Ready To Ski: SAC Has Good Times In Store For You.

WOMEN'S FILMS & DISCUSSION

The SAC Women's Commission has two good things in store for you in the coming week.

On Thursday November 10th, the Commission is sponsoring a series of films at University College in room 179 from 7 to 9 p.m. The general theme will be working women. All interested students are welcome to attend. Admission is free.

An informal discussion on Sexuality: Attitudes and Values will be held on Wednesday November 16th in the Hart House South Sitting Room from 4 to 6 p.m. The speaker will be Rhonda Katz. We look forward to seeing you.

U of T job-oriented courses most popular, says Dean

By KATHY CANTY

Peter Silcox's father was a bus driver. Silcox knew if he didn't go to university he would be a bus driver too. But when he got to university, said Silcox, he found that a university education was more than simply a means of climbing the economic ladder.

Silcox is now the principal of Woodsworth College. He takes the place of Arthur Kruger who became the Dean of Arts and Science this year.

"There are a lot of ways you can look at a university. One is that it's a job training institution. That's not the way I look at it," said Silcox. "The university's main job is to further the intellectual development of the student."

"If you've got a lot of people who have gone through the process of intellectual awakening, it's going to be a richer society, made up of richer individuals. I obviously don't mean richer in a monetary sense," he added.

ENROLMENT DOWN

The poor state of the economy at present, however, has reduced the attractiveness of part-time education, conceded Silcox. Overall part-time student enrolment at Woodsworth dropped this year, but enrolment in job-oriented courses has increased. Declining enrolment "saps the vitality of the university" and hurts it financially, he said. "We don't view it with any enthusiasm."

The high quality of programs at U of T, however, is one reason why this university suffers less from declining enrolment than other universities, claimed Silcox. He felt that a stress on excellence will give U of T an advantage over other universities in competing for students when enrolment begins to drop sharply in the 1980's.

SECOND CLASS CITIZENS

As principal of Woodsworth College Silcox said that it is his job to fight discrimination against part-time students on the campus. "There is still not full acceptance of them as full citizens, although I think they are very close to that now," he said.

Silcox felt that part-time students are being treated as second-class citizens right now in intramural sports. "We have access to the intramural leagues as long as we're playing at a fairly primitive level. Part-time students can participate in the intermediate leagues, but, said Silcox, the athletic director has set up restrictions which exclude almost 70 per cent of Woodsworth students from the inter-faculty leagues.

This is "totally unacceptable," he declared. "In the next few weeks we'll be exerting all the pressure we can to get it changed."

OFF-CAMPUS PROGRAM

One of the innovations introduced by Kruger that Silcox plans to continue is the off-campus part-time students at business and industrial locations.

It "makes people feel that U of T isn't a remote institution," he said. "But once you've got them involved, I think they have to understand and accept that most of their studies are going to be done on the university campus. We'll keep the off-campus program probably at the same level, but change the locations to keep servicing new groups of people in the community."

NEW NEW PROGRAM

Last year Silcox taught a course in Canadian government at Erindale College. He has mixed feelings about the "new New Program," a program which places certain restrictions on course selection at Erindale.

"I like the idea of students having to make some kind of a choice about a program so that they have studied something in a coherent form," said Silcox. "I don't like the specific requirements. It's a bad idea to insist that people do either language courses or math courses."

As an academic, how does Silcox like administrative work? "I like it where it can have some substance." It has its dull moments, he added, but research is boring too sometimes. He expressed a singular distaste, however, for committee meetings. "No job is inspiring and fulfilling all the while."

CIA goes to college campuses

NEW YORK (LNS-CUP) — RCMP agents may be back on campuses in Canada. It seems that the CIA is doing the same thing south of the border.

The CIA has "one or two or perhaps several secret agents" on each of more than 100 American campuses, according to former U.S. National Security Council member Morton Halperin. The agents are employed as administrators, faculty members and teaching graduate students who "basically are recruiters" for the CIA, Halperin told a national conference of U.S. university professors.

A professor of constitutional law attending the conference defended these CIA-academic ties. He asserted that there is little difference between a law firm asking a faculty member to recommend a new employee and the CIA asking agents to identify possible recruits.

The fast food fanatic strikes !

By ANDREW MAHON

There are a million stories on the naked campus. This is just one of them. My name? That's not important. I've got a badge and a uniform. But you can't hide behind a badge, so it helps if you're lucky. Damn lucky.

That's right, I'm a cop. One of U of T's finest. I investigate the libraries and labs. I've been a cop for 10 years now with nothing more to show for it than an ulcer and an aching in my bones that tells me it's time to quit — time to move on. Perhaps get a job as desk sergeant.

But I don't want to complain. I've had ten pretty good years. Yeah, it's been a good stint, except . . . except for one case . . .

It was early last October. I was working with my partner, Dano (he transferred from Hawaii 5-0 because he didn't like the way Steve McGarrett parted his hair). We got a routine call to check out the UC refectory:

— Inspector?
— Yea, Dano.
— We've got a possible 10-17 at the UC refectory.
— A 10-17?
— That's right.
— Holy Cow! You mean a possible fast food theft?
— Looks like it.
— Get a squad car and fast. Let's roll.

When we arrived, the damage had been done. We were too late. One tasty Bagel and cream cheese gone. The waitress was sobbing. I tried to get her to talk.

— Ma'am, try to tell us what happened.

— Oh God, it was horrible. He came in here and demanded a Bagel with cream cheese . . .

She trailed off, crying uncontrollably. Poor woman. What kind of an animal were we dealing with?

— Dano?

— Yeah, chief.

— I want an APB on this guy, fast.

— Right chief.

— And get the boys from the lab down here. Maybe we can get some food prints, or perhaps get a make on these grease stains.

— Right chief.

— Oh, and Dano. Get the police artist down here. When this lady has calmed down, perhaps she can give us a description.

— Of the thief?

— No, the Bagel and cream cheese. I wanna make sure we know what we're dealing with here.

It wasn't much to go on. Just some tell-tale grease stains. But I've worked with less. I needed time, but when you have a maniac on your hands — time is the one thing you don't have.

We checked out the usual places. Engineering, Med Sci and Vic. We came up empty. No clues. And then it happened. He struck again. Innis college. We got over to the pub, but it was too late.

— What have you got?
— Same guy, chief. He got a tuna fish on rye.
— Any prints?
— No chief. But the chef's description matches the UC girls'.

RATS...

— You mean, short with a pumpkin mask?

— Yeah.

— Okay, let's get back to the lab.

When we got back to the lab, we went over everything. Every little detail, looking for something. Some little clue. A lead.

— Okay, Dano. What's this guy's MO?

— Huh?

— How does he operate?

— Oh. He usually takes food that's fresh. No more than one to three days old. He always removes the Handi-Wrap. He never strikes the same place twice.

— Okay. Get a list of fast food outlets within a 2 mile radius of the downtown campus. Check out every greasy spoon from here to Spadina. I want this guy, and I want him fast.

So we kept looking. But it was like looking for a needle in a haystack, except a needle would have been easier. Meanwhile, more thefts. The Coop: 1 packet of Salt and Vinegar Chips. The Buttery: 1 ham and cheese on brown bread. Even the Rolling Stove: 1 fallafel and two jamaican patties . . .

The story was beginning to reach sensational proportions. The Varsity ran this headline: "Fiend fingers fresh fast food." We were beginning to worry.

Then we got a break. A call from the Delicatessen on Huron street. We got over there. The thief was gone, but this time he made a mistake. This time it was a salami. I smiled. I knew we had him. But it wasn't over yet. I let the owner run through the mug shots.

At last. A positive id. There was only one place on campus where you could hide that kind of fast food. The SAC offices. The pieces started to fall together.

It was an inside job. Some SAC official was obviously involved. We checked the records at the lab. There was only one SAC official who matched the description we had: "Honest" Johnny Tuzyk. Of course. Only a mastermind like him could have devised such an ingenious heist.

— Dano

— Yeah.

— Get three squad cars, an ambulance, a SWAT team, and a dietician down to the SAC building.

— A dietician?

— That's right pal, and move. This is an emergency.

We got down there, but it wasn't going to be that simple. Tuzyk was in there, but he wasn't about to give up. As far as we knew, he was armed and dangerous.

— Okay, Dano. Give the men some fast food to defend themselves with. Here, take these 'Cheesies' and 'Hostess Twinkies.'

I wanted to take him alive, so I used the megaphone.

— Come on Tuzyk, give yourself up. You're surrounded. Are you going to come quietly or do we have to go on eating?

— You'll never take me alive, pig. I wanna be SAC president forever. Do you hear me? I wanna be King of U of T.

— Tuzyk! Tuzyk, I want you to come out with your hands up. Do you hear me? Throw down your salami and come out quietly. That way, no one's gonna get hurt.

It worked. Tuzyk came out. He was a broken man — but isn't that the way it always goes with SAC officials? At least no one was hurt, and the mystery was solved.

Tuzyk had thought he could heist this fast food and sell it to a fence. With the extra bucks, he would finance his re-election campaign and be SAC president forever. Well, it almost worked, but he made one heist too many.

I guess that's all there is to say, really, except perhaps this: If you play around with a 'hot' salami, you'll get your fingers burned.' See ya around, 10-4.

The big Tory get-together in Quebec City

Varsity reporter Jeff Buckstein attended the recent Progressive Conservative Biennial Convention in Quebec City. Here is one student's account of the high-powered politics of a federal party.

To the overwhelming delight of 1,400 delegates from across Canada, Joe Clark now appears to be the leader of a united political party. At the Progressive Conservative Party's national convention in Quebec City last weekend, 93.1 percent of the delegates voted against a proposed leadership convention.

SAC organizes blood game and helps save lives

"U of T's blood donor clinic is the largest and most important clinic sponsored by the Red Cross in Toronto," said David Jones, vice-president of the Students' Administrative Council (SAC). "And anything under 2,000 pints of blood donated is unacceptable."

Blood donations have been down in the past few years. In response to this, SAC approached three nursing students to help prevent a further decrease. "Personally calling key members of individual colleges and faculties as well as more promotional work done by students helped make this year's blood donor clinic one of the most successful ever," said nursing student Lori Allen.

An increase in blood donations of 50 percent brought this year's total up to 1,800 pints, compared to last year's 1,200 pints according to Allen. Meds students deserve congratulations for their turnout, which reached 23.1 percent of the faculty. The only other faculty which contributed anything near this figure came from the Phys Ed students whose donations reached 16.4 percent.

Trinity College held a raffle with supper tickets for two as a prize. Perhaps this accounts for the increase in donations from 0.5 percent to 8.3 percent.

The architects, judging their

This change in fortunes has coincided with the recent wiretapping scandal and the advent of television in the House of Commons. These developments appear to be increasing public support for the Progressive Conservative Party as a real alternative to Pierre Trudeau and the Liberal Party.

As Clark dealt with these matters in his convention speech on November 4, it was apparent that his speaking manner had improved considerably, as had his ability to deal effectively and aggressively with the issues concerning Canadians.

This was my first political convention and the four days I spent in Quebec City were action-filled. Not all of it was political. There were dances and parties, and a group of us went to a disco on Saturday night. Sleeping was deferred until we got back to Toronto, or Winnipeg, or Vancouver, or wherever we lived as the delegates came from all across Canada.

I was a delegate from the Scarborough College PC Club. The U of T PC Club also sent delegates. We left Union Station last Wednesday and arrived in Quebec City that evening after a stopover in Montreal.

At the Progressive Conservative

Youth Federation (PCYF) convention held Thursday and Friday, Stuart MacKinnon of Vancouver was elected President of the Executive Council. The Presidential Candidates' dinner Thursday evening featured guest speaker Joe Clark, who received a standing ovation amidst cheers of "Joe! Joe! Joe!" The dinner was held at the Chateau Frontenac, one of the most beautiful hotels in North America.

The convention halls swelled the next day as senior delegates arrived. (I was a delegate to the senior convention and an alternate to the PCYF convention.) We were addressed by David Crombie, mayor of Toronto, Premier William Davis, newly elected Manitoba Premier Sterling Lyon and Quebec's Union Nationale leader Rodrigue Biron, who told the convention that "Canada must understand the problems of Quebec in the next election or there may not be another chance."

Speaking about Quebec, a group of us attended the Quebec legislative assembly. The Parti Quebecois' chief asset was pounding on desks and screaming out of turn at the speaker who had the floor. Liberal member Bryce Mackasey, a former Trudeau cabinet minister, charged the PQ with trying to fool the Quebec people with the separation crisis in order to take their minds off unemployment. "If you're going to hold a referendum, hold it now!" said Mackasey. He was shouted down throughout his whole speech, which was directed at House Leader Robert Burns, representing Rene Levesque, who was in Paris. The PQ refused to speak a word of English throughout the session.

Clark's speech Friday night was covered by the CBC. In a hard-hitting speech Clark attacked the Trudeau government for the wiretapping scandal and for high unemployment. He said that a Progressive Conservative government would emphasize the private sector of the economy, and that "sunset laws would be introduced into the public sector. That is, just as a program is deemed necessary and set up by the government, like a sunrise, once its use is up, so must there be a sunset."

At the election of the PC executive on Sunday morning, Nova Scotian MP Robert Coates was chosen President.

The trip provided the experience of watching many political campaigns (for the national executive) and to see the chief political figures in the Conservative Party. There was even time for fun and games. On Saturday morning we were served breakfast by the federal MPs. Former PC leader Robert Stanfield, chef hat and all, led the march into the dining room.

Sexual exploitation continues at UBC

VANCOUVER (CUP) — Several recent cases of sexual harassment of women at the University of British Columbia demonstrate that sexual exploitation is still very much of a problem at universities.

In one case, a female science research assistant was propositioned by a male employee. After turning him down, the woman continued to be harassed on the job, and soon quit.

In another, a woman living in one of UBC's student residences was harassed by a male professor who continually phoned her, often in the middle of the night.

UBC dean of women Margaret Fulton says that sexual exploitation of women is a serious concern on the campus. She adds that female students are often propositioned by male professors and teaching assistants to give sexual favours in return for good marks.

Fulton says this kind of exploitation in universities "demoralizes the whole educational system," and prevents women from achieving their fullest potential as students and as mature, intellectual human beings.

Because the university has no formal disciplinary procedures which could help women deal with the problem, and they instead face repeated denials that the problem even exists, the result is that women are forced to solve these kinds of sexist predicaments on their own.

And, as Fulton points out, if a woman does complain about being harassed, the male professor can always fail her.

People's Front continues to struggle in Chile

By LORNE GERSHUNY
and MARK BUFFIN

"The Chilean resistance will win" said Camilo Maturana, a representative of the People's Front of Chile, to a crowd of over 200 at the Medical Sciences Auditorium on Sunday night. The meeting was part of a six-week nation-wide tour to popularize the People's Front of Chile and to raise funds.

Maturana spoke of the reasons for the tour: "The overthrow of the fascist regime in Chile depends on the Chilean peoples' struggles but international solidarity is also important."

He stated that in the four years since the coup that brought the military dictatorship to power, inflation has increased at one per cent every day, 25 per cent of the active population is unemployed and parliament and elections have been banned. He related that electoral lists have been burnt and the media controlled by the dictatorship.

The People's Front of Chile, he said, was formed a few months after the coup of 1973. The organization comprises workers, peasants, students, tradesmen, and intellectuals, all of whom are united against the dictatorship. The foundation of the People's Front of Chile is the resistance committees each composed of three to five people. They operate with close secrecy and fight security.

There must be unity in the "struggle against fascism," Maturana stated, but unity is difficult to achieve because two different lines have been presented: the defeatist line and the revolutionary line. The defeatists advocate replacing the dictatorship with a more "democratic" military clique.

The revolutionaries do not simply wish to "change the mask of the dictatorship," he said. Their aim is to overthrow the dictatorship and "not to return to an obsolete form of government."

Some elements of the Popular Unity government, which was toppled in the coup, have learned from the downfall of the late President Salvador Allende and are now participating in the People's Front, he said. The Revolutionary Communist Party of Chile and members of the Socialist Party and the Movement of United Popular Action (MAPU) who have remained in Chile are among those supporting the People's Front, Maturana stated.

Maturana cited numerous examples of resistance in Chile. Students occupied an admissions office, he said making registration impossible in a demonstration against "astronomical tuition fees" imposed by the authorities, who were forced to reduce the fees on some courses and exempt others.

Women's groups have demonstrated for the cause of missing persons and political prisoners, he said. Women occupied the Supreme Court and held a hunger strike in the UN offices in Santiago.

The tour by the representative from Chile will cover all regions of Canada before concluding in Toronto on December 10th.

Data centre lock-out continues to disrupt U of Montreal

MONTREAL (CUP) — A threat by the administration of the Université de Montreal to cancel the registration of all students participating in a boycott of tuition fees is not being carried through because of a lock-out at the university's data centre.

In response to a boycott organized by the central student union (FAECUM) against a new regulation requiring the immediate payment of fees, the administration had set a revised deadline of Nov. 1 for fee payment, after which students who had not paid would have their registration annulled and would have to withdraw from all courses.

But because of the lockout at the data centre, the administration has not been able to compile accurate statistics on names of students and amounts of fees paid. So the boycott continues, with all students — paid up or not — remaining in classes.

Reports from different sources in the administration and the students association indicate widespread confusion over the amount of money the university has received and the participation rate in the boycott.

According to the vice-rector of the university 85 per cent of the fees billed have been received. The administration newspaper states that the receipts amount to 80 per cent of the fees. And a third source, the director of finances, maintains that more than 90 per cent of the figure has been received.

However, a spokesperson for FAECUM says that each of these figures includes money owing from last year when there was no regulation imposing a deadline for payment.

A survey by the geography students association conducted just before the deadline passed reported that 60 per cent of the students surveyed were supporting the boycott and had not paid their fees. But that figure is not considered accurate because most of the students polled were members of the geography department and other surveys show that participation in the boycott varies by department.

FAECUM claims that a more accurate figure, taken from a number of different polls, would be 35 per cent.

Tuition fees account for 7.2 per cent of the university's total operating budget. The university receives a major source of its revenue from the provincial government in the form of per student subsidy.

Fencers Do Well

By KEVIN KURNIK

This past weekend U of T's men's and women's foil teams travelled to Western for the first tournament of the season, the Western Invitational. There was a total of nine teams in each of the weapons.

The men's team got off to a good start and advanced to the semi-finals with wins over McMaster (8-1) and York (5-4). In the semi-finals they were matched against York in a direct elimination. Here the team which consisted of Rick Arthur, Alan Steljis and Les Dubovich pulled together with a decisive five bouts to one victory.

This put them in the finals against Western. They downed Western I 5-0 but lost to Western II 5-4. For some unknown reason Western II defeated Western I, which left Toronto in third place.

Meanwhile, the girls' team picked up where they finished off last year. The team, spear-headed by Lillian Dobay along with Alice Chen, Sue Langley and Debbie Frankish put away Western II and Ryerson in the first round. Then they eliminated Western II nine bouts to two to advance to the finals.

Their opponents were Western I and Queen's in the round-robin final. Western beat Queen's which set the stage for a repeat of last year's final. Lillian was in fine form taking all four of her bouts, leading the team to a well fought 9-7 victory.

Rowers: A Banner Year

By WALTER REID

The rowing season officially ended for fifty crew members on Saturday, October 29. The U of T St. George and Erindale campuses combined total points at the Ontario Universities Athletic Association finals in St. Catharines, to defeat the long standing victors from the University of Western by one point.

Much of the Varsity rowing team's success at the downtown campus was due to the philosophy of head coach Chris French. His job was to whip fifty guys into five competitive eight man crews in six weeks. The Toronto crews spent all available practice time on the water and left land training to the individual crew men.

What motivates a Varsity oarsman to rise each morning at five to scrounge for transportation to the waterfront, sometimes in sub zero weather, to row his guts out for one and half hours before class? Rowing demands great personal discipline, an explosive yet totally controlled output of strength, in perfect harmony with seven other guys.

Rowing challenges the athlete's raw physical strength and stamina as well as his ability to use his strength with finesse. An early morning row can be quite an exhilarating experience.

The boat is silhouetted against the bright orange sky and water and mist is rising from the satin smooth lake. The air is crisp as it rushes by, but you are warm and limbered up. The only sound is the slap of eight blades as they cut the water in perfect unison, and then the long glide where the bubbles tease the sixty foot hull with a fizzing noise.

You know you are rowing well and there is a feeling of unity throughout the boat. It is the individual satisfaction of being able to control your strength and the intense feeling of harmony when everyone is sculling together that probably makes rowing an enjoyable enough sport to warrant getting up so early.

What are the plans of the rowing team? Winter training will begin in December and will include weight training, running and regular workouts on the two rowing machines designed by Dr. Peter Klavara of the U of T.

Come spring, the crews will be back on the water by mid-April to train for the Dad Vail regatta held in Philadelphia. Last year for the first time U of T sent a crew to international competition at the Dad Vail.

The aim of the rowing program is expansion. By expanding and upgrading the calibre of rowing at Toronto it is hoped we can produce more international rowers. At present, two national class oarsmen row for the U of T and several more will be going to the national training camp this summer.

Toronto is coming off its most successful season. At the McMaster Regatta, the U of T swept all four men's events. Chris French is contemplating sending Toronto crews to the English Henley Regatta this summer. Toronto sent two crews to the Rideau Regatta in Ottawa in October.

The U of T rowing program is already showing signs of expansion with five competitive crews this year and an increase in the calibre of rowing is evident by the success at the OUAA finals.

Next year it is hoped the team will come up with a more convincing victory at the OUAA's and participate in more regattas of an international calibre. A full time summer rowing program would be a major step towards refining rowing as would be the initiation of a women's program.

Many thanks must go to Bob Boraks who revived rowing at the U of T four years ago and to coxswain Larry Marshall whose common sense has quietly helped guide the team along a true path both on and off the water.

Thanks must also go to Marie Samut for her administrative advice and support. The newly elected captain is Tim Turner; vice-captain, Peter McKenna. This year's co-captains Rob Haig and Walter Reid wish them luck.

For information concerning rowing, call: Tim Turner, 932-0224 or 960-5411 or Peter McKenna 822-9169.

Lady Blues Win Canadian Championships

By GLYNIS PETERS

A dazed group of thirteen young women were wandering around campus Monday morning trying to come back to earth and school, less than twenty-four hours after walking out of Molson Stadium in Montreal with gold medals. The 1977 Canadian Intercollegiate Field Hockey title has come back to the University of Toronto after a brief absence, and the victory was sweet!

To start at the beginning of this final climb to victory, one must turn back the clock to Wednesday, November 2. . . . Hoping to get in as much practice on astro turf as possible, Coach Liz Hoffman flew her team to Montreal before any of the opposition. The plane landed at 3 o'clock and the team was practicing by 4 after changing at the airport. The first game was scheduled for 6:30 on Thursday, giving Toronto one more opportunity to practice before meeting St. Mary's University, winners of the Atlantic Conference. St. Mary's surprise upset of Dalhousie brought them to the tournament as an unscouted team, and Toronto took to the field knowing only that Joan Selig as their centre half was a dangerous opponent and they played a 5-3-2 strategy.

The Blues lived up to their reputation as slow starters and were not in top form against what proved to be a dynamic St. Mary's squad. A goal by Glynis Peters put Toronto ahead just before the end of the first half but the team seemed to come back to the pitch slowly once more. A scramble in the Toronto circle resulted in a penalty stroke for St. Mary's, whose striker was successful, and although this spurred Toronto on to completely dominate the rest of the match, the score remained 1-1.

In this opening game, Toronto's defence showed signs of the superb performance they were to turn in for the remaining five games. Lou Ann Mailling and Jean Gourlay worked together brilliantly in the fullback positions, but the forwards just could not seem to carry their initial thrust. Jean Gray, at left outside halfback completely demolished her rookie status as she calmly held her position and outmanoeuvred the opposition.

Heavy rain made the next morning's game a battle of the elements rather than of the opposition. The water gathering on the turf made the pace of the ball difficult to judge and any effective stick work practically impossible. Moving from the fast pitch of the night before to the first game of the day on what was practically a lake certainly tested the team's versatility!

A lone goal, scored by Donna Allaby from a corner hit, (which seemed to be the only way anybody was going to score), assured the Blues of a victory.

The rain stopped, the field was drained and Toronto stormed out to take on McGill in their second game of the day. It took U of T the first half to readjust to being able to hit a ball and move it more than a foot, without splashing everyone within five yards, before they settled down and played one of their best halves of hockey. Within fifteen minutes the Blues were leading 3-0 and in complete control of the game. Carol McDougall and Cathy "CBR" Brown found the net in open play while Jean Gourlay moved up to the circle on a corner to send a sizzling drive into the goal.

At the end of Thursday's action Toronto was tied with St. Mary's for second place and attention focussed on the St. Mary's-Manitoba match the next morning. Manitoba emerged victorious, leaving them in first position and Toronto faced with either winning or tying both of their next games to stay in contention.

Squaring off against the University of British Columbia, Toronto found their opponents strong for the first 10 minutes of the game but for the ensuing 60 minutes the Blues easily dominated the play. U.B.C., given the advantage of a corner situation, popped one in but Donna Allaby capitalized on a penalty stroke awarded to Toronto to even the score. The stroke was awarded when a U.B.C. fullback prevented a sure goal with an illegal hand stop.

Despite advantage situations such as these, field hockey is usually a tight, low-scoring game. An increasing emphasis on defensive play has made scoring a difficult task. Coach Hoffman felt at the end of the game that the team was playing exceptionally well and felt sure that a continuation of such a performance augured well for the next match, against Manitoba. "The key will be positional disciplined hockey," she predicted.

Manitoba, a dark horse from the outset, but with three national players proved to be an excellent team. They passed extremely well and displayed some superb stick work. Now, if they were that good, so we need to describe the performance turned in by Toronto that resulted in a decisive 1-0 victory? "The team flowed," said Coach Hoffman. She had nothing but praise for each member of the team, all of whom she felt had turned in personal season's bests. Cathy "CBR" Brown, true to her reputation for possessing a magic touch around the net, gave Toronto their single goal.

Goalie Lynn Halliday, in her last year at Toronto, anchored the team, as she has done consistently throughout the season. "Her angles were perfect," Hoffman said, "and if they shot wide it's because she made them."

The stage was set for the final game to take place at 1 p.m. on Sunday. After five hard-fought games within a period of three days it was a bruised but determined team that lined up for the last game of their 1977 season. Practices five mornings a week and two evenings, games every weekend, and individual help whenever sought, had all led to this final 70 minute game. Both teams were now accustomed to the artificial surface and had tested each other once. Coach Hoffman had scouted the opposition and prepared her team thoroughly for Manitoba's strategy, as you can be sure the Manitoba coach, Hilary Findlay, had also done. The teams were starting out evenly.

Toronto moved into action immediately and scored before the ten-minute mark of the first half. Nancy Wehrens, at right wing, received a pass from inner Anne Hofland and drove the ball into the far corner of the Manitoba goal. Giving full credit to Wehrens, Coach Hoffman was elated to remark that the goal was the result of considerable and well-executed passing through the defensive and mid-field areas. Everyone was in position, as the team moved the ball together, with Wehrens putting the icing on the cake.

Manitoba stormed back and exerted pressure on the Blues for the remainder of the game with the last 10 minutes severely testing the Toronto defence. Carol McDougall clearly demonstrated her experience as she thwarted the attack down the left side of the field time and again. Cathy "Snapdragon" Brown and Donna Allaby blocked any offensive plays from penetrating centre field and Patty Barclay prevented any attempt to approach from the right.

It is interesting to note that Manitoba later had three of their players named to the tournament's all-star team and their right-half, Paula Parks, chosen as most valuable player. But it was the strong team effort by Toronto that gave them the Championship and not individual stars. No two players can be as skilled or dedicated as Jean Gourlay and Donna Allaby, however, without being recognized. These two national players truly deserved to be named to the tournament All-Star team and are to be congratulated.

Perhaps the most telling award, in the final analysis, was that of Coach of the Year, presented to Liz Hoffman. The moulding of 13 individuals into a solid Championship team is a feat deserving of such an honour.

Before signing off for the 1977 season mention must be made of Jane "JB" Wright who made sure the team got to the right pitch at the right time with all their equipment, and Joe "Peach" Piccinini who kept the team taped together before a game and "in stitches" after every game. Thanks!

Basketball Blues Make Improvements For 77-78

By JIM O'LEARY

In his 23rd year as the U of T basketball coach, John McManus is optimistic in his outlook for the coming season which begins with a game against Laurentian this Friday (Benson Building 8:15). The reason for this optimism is twofold.

First of all, the rebuilding job which has been going on for the last couple of years should start to pay dividends this year as many players now have the experience necessary to carry the team to the playoffs.

Secondly, the basketball team has been moved from their traditional practise court at Hart House to a new facility at the Benson Building. According to McManus this will make a big difference.

In past years, the team practised at Hart House but played at the Benson Gym. The Hart House floor is 22 feet shorter and 10 feet narrower than the Benson floor which made it difficult for the players to adjust during the games. It was like playing all their games on a foreign court as the floor, backboards and lighting were all different.

The smaller surface made it difficult for the players to attain peak conditioning. As a result, McManus tells of many games in which Toronto entered the fourth quarter leading but ran out of steam and lost.

This fall, a new floor was installed at the Benson Building which McManus describes as being "as good as any in the country." With great facilities, McManus expects the team to make improvements on the court as well as attract better players to the U of T in the future. In the past the best players were often turned off by the poor Hart House facilities.

A good facility will only help win a championship if you have good players to take advantage of it. This year's team boasts four players returning to the five starting posts. Last year, the Blues had six freshmen on the roster who, with a year's experience, will be counted on to come up big.

Headlining the list of veterans is fourth year Phys-Ed student Doug Fox. Fox is coming off his best season, placing fourth in league scoring and being named to the second all-star team. As well as being a good scorer, the six-foot one-inch guard is also a standout on defence.

In six-foot seven-inch centre Randy Cook, the Blues have last year's rebounding leader. Cook is also good at putting the ball through the hoop and placed twelfth in league scoring last year. Over the last couple of seasons McManus

Blues Captain Earns His "C"

By JIM O'LEARY

In recent years excellent team captains have been a tradition with U of T hockey teams. These players have included Gord Davies, Warren Anderson, Kent Runke and Ron Harris. Each of these players have combined leadership with proficient skills to lead the Blues to a number of Ontario and Canadian championships. This year the task of the captaincy has been awarded to veteran left winger Larry Hopkins.

"It's a great honour to be named captain. The captains have been excellent in the past," explained Hopkins. "The captain has the added responsibility of leading by example." Other than that Hopkins does not feel more pressure as a result of his captaincy. He just hopes to play as he did last year when he patrolled his left wing with authority.

Last season he surprised most people by leading the team in scoring with 76 points on 30 goals and 48 assists in 48 games. This was a far cry better than the previous season when he potted 10 goals and 18 assists in 44 games.

Hopkins attributes his improvement to a change of attitude on his part. "In past seasons I played with Runke and Pagnutti (Don) and was expected to play a defensive game and leave the scoring to them. Last season I played on a new line where I was expected to score more goals to help the team. I worked hard to improve my offensive skills."

Hopkins is the first to admit that "winning three championships in a row will be tough. Other teams save their best effort for us which means we have to be ready for every game." The Blues, however, are confident they will go far this year.

Hopkins says "this team reminds me of the team we had in my first year here, in that it has a lot of individual talent. We have to put it all together as a team though, which is where my role as captain could be important. If we get the same effort as last year we will be hard to beat."

Hopkins has completed his Bachelor of Commerce degree and is working towards his C.A. He feels it is important to have an education that it is tough to catch on with a pro team unless you have a contract before you go to camp. Hopkins was satisfied with his play in the Motor City but felt he wasn't given the same opportunity to prove himself as the players who had already signed. "The Red Wings had 40 guys already on contract and were reluctant to sign any more," explains Hopkins.

Hopkins feels he is only one in a trend of players who has opted for university hockey rather than try to make it to the N.H.L. by way of the minor pro ranks. According to the big left winger, "players are realizing that salaries are not very good in the minors and jobs are scarcer than they once were. College hockey is a good alternative because it not only gives you a good chance to improve your hockey skills but it provides you with something to fall back on if you don't make it in hockey."

Hopkins is in his fifth and final year with the Blues. In that span he has won Ontario and Canadian championships, led the team in scoring, travelled in Europe and China and been appointed to the prestigious position of captain. Still he has not accomplished all he would like to in College hockey.

It has always been a goal of Hopkins to play for the Student National Team. This year Hopkins has a good chance of realizing his final goal. He is one of 29 players who survived the cuts of the August training camp of the student team and is looking forward to earning a starting berth on the team which will be picked in December.

If Hopkins approaches the student team with the same dedication and determination he applies to the Blues he will have little trouble realizing his final dream.

Larry Hopkins epitomizes hard work and dedication.

In case the pro hockey career he aspires to does not work out.

In 1974 Hopkins was drafted by the Atlanta Flames of the National Hockey League but did not go to camp, preferring to come to the U of T. Atlanta released him and he was picked up by the Detroit Red Wings.

Hopkins reported to the Detroit camp this fall and was one of the final cuts of the Red Wings. His tenure in Detroit, however, taught him a valuable lesson. He learned feels Cook has been the most improved player on the team.

College of Education student Tim McManus is looking forward to a lot of playing time this season. His play last year would certainly seem to qualify him for it. He placed tenth in league scoring with 193 points.

McManus feels the league is as tough this year as it has been at any time in the past. He is looking for Toronto to grab the final playoff spot.

York could very well be the best team in the country, according to McManus. During the off season they acquired a number of outstanding players, the most notable being a six-foot ten-inch centre from Princeton. Laurentian and Carleton also figure to be strong. Laurentian was a league finalist last year while Carleton finished right behind them in the standings with an 11-3 record.

According to McManus the key to success could be conditioning. For this reason McManus works his players very hard in practice and boasts that "you will not find any player dragging his ass around here."

Conditioning will certainly be an important factor in the league opener against a powerful Laurentian team on Friday. When the Voyagers come to town, we will all be given a better indication of how much difference the change in practice locations has made to the team as well as an indication of the strength of this year's team.

The Varsity - Jim O'Leary

SAC a corporate baron - union

"Their attitude has indicated that they're more interested in playing the role of turn-of-the-century corporate barons than in finding a healthy way of dealing with staff relations."

Alice Klein, acting president of CUPE local 1222 spoke in an interview about the current state of contract negotiations between the Students' Administrative Council (SAC) and its unionized employees.

The union represents 10 SAC employees whose duties include clerical work, coordination and organization of special projects instigated by SAC and the national-provincial council federations SAC belongs to, and preparing ads for The Varsity. Klein herself is an assistant to the SAC executive and is in charge of laying the groundwork for student campaigns such as the Lobby Day held at Queen's Park yesterday.

The union submitted its contract proposals on September 1. Since that time four bargaining meetings have been held including one last night. As yet no wage offer has been made and the union has not yet received those amendments to the contract that will effect the employees comprising the special projects staff. Brian O'Riordan, member of the three-man SAC bargaining team, said that a wage offer has to await a final decision on the SAC budget and the issue of whether there should be an increase in SAC student fees.

The union, however, claims that SAC financial worries are an excuse to put off an agreement. They pointed out that SAC's pendency has not prevented it from hiring, for the first time in SAC-union negotiations, a corporate lawyer. Louise Binder works for the law firm of Osler, Hoskin and Harcourt, a firm which according to a source at the Ontario Federation of Labour "handles quite a number of labor contracts."

SAC president John Tuzyk stated that "it's not unusual for an organization with a cash flow of over $one million to spend a few thousand dollars on legal advice." Neither Tuzyk nor Osler, Hoskin and Harcourt would disclose the exact amount SAC is paying the law firm.

The union charges that the hiring of a corporate lawyer and SAC's attitude at the negotiations indicates a desire on SAC's part to view itself as a business organization. SAC's tactics, according to the union are more appropriate to a profit-making concern than to student service organization.

O'Riordan attributed the union's comments to "inexperience." "We can't run a social club," he commented, adding that the division between management and employees was introduced into SAC with the unionization of the staff in 1969. He called Klein's charge that SAC views itself as a corporate baron "outlandish" and "inflammatory."

The negotiations are taking place following a tense summer during which one employee was fired, another quit and still another was warned of dismissal. Among the incidents that took place this summer:

• Terry Reagan, hired as Internal Assistant on June 6 and fired on June 30, the last day of his probationary period. Since he was still on probation SAC did not have to prove just cause for his dismissal. As reason for his dismissal SAC cited his allegedly "uncooperative" attitude.

The union, however, filed a grievance on his behalf charging that Reagan was fired because "of his possible future activity with the union." The charge was in part based on an overheard conversation between Tuzyk and O'Riordan according to Arts & Science Students' union fieldworker Terri Weatherhead, who was present when the conversation took place. O'Riordan had said at the time "We've got the information, we're going to smash them (the union)" to which Tuzyk replied "You know whom we really have to watch?" Tuzyk, said Weatherhead, then ran over several names one of which was Reagan's. Reagan, who had taken the job after moving to Toronto from Montreal, was fired sometime after this conversation took place. Reagan is currently employed as the Western fieldworker for the National Union of Students.

• In August SAC threatened to dismiss its Communications Assistant Ron Cohen. Like Reagan, Cohen was accused in a letter from Tuzyk of displaying an "inability to function in a cooperative manner with the members of the executive." The letter, dated August 16, cited as evidence of Cohen's uncooperative

Bar age to be 19

By SEAN DUNPHY

By a vote of 72 to 29 the Ontario Legislature approved in principle a private members bill which would raise the drinking age in Ontario from 18 to 19 years of age. The bill was referred to a committee of the whole house.

Voting on the bill crossed party lines, but all but three Liberal members (including former leader Robert Nixon and present leader Stuart Smith) voted in favor of the measure introduced by Liberal Remo Mancini. The New Democratic Party was roughly one-half in favor (including Stephen Lewis) and one half against. The conservative backbenchers in general voted for the bill, while most Cabinet ministers voted against it. Conspicuously absent from the voting was Premier William Davis.

Debate on the bill was heavily one-sided in favor of it. Most members seemed to believe the bill would make access to alcohol difficult for high school students among whom a great drinking problem exists, they contended. They also pointed to statistics issued by the Addiction Research Council which reveal an increase in the number of drinking drivers among the 16-20 year age group since the drinking age was lowered in 1971.

New Democrat Fred Young said the Legislature had not anticipated the vigor with which the alcohol companies would go after the youth market. The problem is a difficult one, he said, both for those concerned with "saving lives" on the one hand, and "saving civil liberties" on the other. Alcoholism among youth "arises right out of the attitudes of society itself." Society, in reaction to the drug abuse of the '60's, "persuaded them (youth) that they should drop their drug for the adult drug of alcohol," he stated.

Conservative Terry Jones said he never claimed that "age is the cure-all for the problem of alcohol consumption among our young people. "I want them to have their focus straight" in order to attain their goals. The bill would "relieve a lot of that pressure and potential for disaster," he stated.

Liberal Robert Nixon, although he voted against the bill, spoke in favor of it. He said that he is "not so naive as to think the bill will solve the problems," but the proper approach "should lie with getting (alcohol) out of the high schools."

He said that raising the age to 19 is enough, but some are proposing an age of 20. He stated that "something more than a vote by this house is necessary." He suggested a four point program, including raising the drinking age, a strengthening of identification procedures, cracking down on life style advertising, and using the school system to "assisting young people in deciding what moderate drinking can be." The proposal gained widespread support.

Observers at Queen's Park feel the Conservative government will introduce its own bill encompassing most of Nixon's proposals in the new year, and that by next May the drinking age will go up to at least 19.

Banking in S. Africa: no stand, more study

By TOM KUHN

A proposed task force on university investment in banks giving loans to South Africa came under discussion at the External Affairs Committee meeting on Wednesday.

The motion to re-open the question of bank loans to South Africa was presented by graduate student governor Chris Rogers. A motion to censure the Royal Bank of Canada was defeated by the Business Affairs Committee last spring.

"I think (Chris Rogers) is asking too narrow a question. Why just South Africa?" Governing Council Chairman Marjorie Paikin. "If we look at university investment in a broader context, the discussion might be more productive, although the solution perhaps might not be easier," she added.

John Cowan, committee chairman, said it was his belief that the Subcommittee on Voting of Proxies was set up for this purpose, although it was not adequately handling the problem of morality in regard to investment.

Paikin countered that consideration of investment policy itself has not previously been discussed in Governing Council. The Subcommittee on Voting of Proxies, created in 1975, does not determine investment policy but whether proxies on those investments already held should be voted or not, she said.

Rogers, withdrew his motion since as it was worded it was a re-consideration of the previous Business Affairs Committee motion. As such it would require a two-thirds vote from Governing Council.

Rogers, however, took issue with Paikin, saying broader investment policy was not his concern; only South African investments are.

"They are the only country that does what they do," said Rogers. "It's not only business relations with South Africa, but other relations as well with which I think we should be concerned," he added.

"I don't think there is any doubt about the odiousness of what is happening there," said Sonja Sinclair, government appointee on the External Affairs committee. She did question whether withdrawing funds from such banking institutions would have any effect on Canadian investment in South Africa.

Rogers said he would re-submit his motion for a task force on the "broader or narrower question" of university investment at the next meeting in January.

To vote or not to vote?

By GEORGE COOK

A battle is shaping up among members of the Students' Administrative Council (SAC) over a possible referendum on a SAC fee increase.

A motion against such a referendum was put by Engineering representative Tom Simpson at last Wednesday's SAC meeting.

"I don't think we need to grow any more," Simpson stated.

SAC president John Tuzyk said three factors had to be taken into account when discussing a possible fee increase. He cited declining enrolment and the resulting drop in revenue, inflation and the growth of SAC projects and programs in the last five years.

Tuzyk later said: "It's my feeling right now that it may be inevitable."

The matter was referred to the SAC finance commission for study. The commission was asked to report its findings in a few weeks' time.

Under SAC bylaws no increase can be levied without approval by the student body in a referendum.

Finance commissioner Doug Robertson said after the meeting SAC was "dangerously close to insolvency." Robertson stated he was in favor of holding a referendum to raise fees.

Fees could go up as much as five dollars per student, Robertson said.

In a subsequent telephone interview, however, he retracted his earlier statements. "My defenses were down at the time," he said. "If we manage to keep within our budget we may not need a referendum," he added.

Thief walked away with plaque

By ANDREW MAHON

The Erindale Walkway plaque, an item of hot controversy since its installation on October 13th, is missing.

However, the commemorative plaque is in good hands.

"The evening after it was installed, someone endeavored to remove it," said Walter Terry, Assistant Manager of Physical plant. "The next day it was taken to a machinist to be repaired".

The plaque was part of Erindale College's gift (the Walkway) to U of T on the occasion of its Sesquicentennial birthday.

Controversy surrounding the new Walkway dates back to September when The Varsity inadvertently revealed the secret presentation date of the infamous plaque.

Terry said that the plaque, after it has been repaired, will be fixed in such a way so "it will be impossible to remove."

There'll never be another Vice President like Richard.

Never.

The President made that promise to himself last Thursday afternoon, after Richard blew an important new-business presentation.

Richard isn't incompetent.

The villain is his lunches, or rather the too-many drinks he often has at lunch. Come afternoon, he's just not as sharp as he was in the morning.

Richard is playing dice with his health. His old-fashioned business style is also sabotaging his career.

Today, with competition so rough and stakes so high, even the most generous company can't be patient for long with an employee whose effectiveness ends at noon.

If you're a friend, do Richard a favour by reminding him of the good sense of moderation.

You can bet the man eyeing his job won't help him.

Human rights & economics tied

By SEAN DUNPHY

The Canadian Government has lived with oppressive regimes for so long "there is no reason to believe that they will not be able to live with one at home," said John Saul, Social Sciences Professor at Atkinson College, to about 160 people at the St. Lawrence Centre on Wednesday night.

The Forum entitled "Trade Off? Human Rights or Economics," was sponsored by Amnesty International. Speakers included David Grier, Chief Corporate Affairs Advisor to the Royal Bank of Canada, David MacDonald, Conservative MP for Egmont and Geoffrey Pearson, Director General of External Affairs Bureau of United Nations Affairs.

According to Pearson, Canada's policy keeps "trade and politics as distinct as possible." He said that Canadian action on human rights is based on the twin policies of "appropriateness and effectiveness." The government will only act when it is sure of its facts and feels its actions will have a positive effect, he said. Canadian efforts are usually low-key diplomatic interventions, and usually only on behalf of Canadians, Pearson added.

The United Nations has experienced difficulty in dealing strongly with the human rights question, Pearson explained, because "the UN is a political organization" which has "yet to evolve its own 'common law'." Economic sanctions, if imposed by the UN, could have a deleterious effect, Pearson maintained. "The slower the pace of economic development, the slower the advancement in the field of human rights," he said.

Saul said the recent interest in human rights stems largely from U.S. President Jimmy Carter's policy. He stated, however, that Carter's policy is a "sham" in light of American activities in Cuba, Chile, and Viet Nam, as well as their support of oppressive regimes around the world. Even Canada has towed the line, he said, pointing to the recent revelation that a Canadian diplomat in Cuba accepted $5,000 from the CIA to infect Cuban poultry with a viral disease.

According to Saul, Canadians must realize that trade with countries violating human rights has the dual effect of shoring up these regimes and reaping Canadian corporations' abnormal profits from the cheap labor available in these countries before action can be proposed against these regimes.

MacDonald rejected the idea that "economic activity is a neutral endeavor." Nor did he feel that government action on human rights poses "an unwarranted intrusion" in the internal affairs of another country.

MacDonald has recently introduced a private members' bill to the House of Commons which would prohibit Canadian corporations from trading with countries established as gross and continuous violators of human rights.

Grier said he has observed a slow change in attitudes among businessmen towards a more humanistic approach to foreign investments, but one "must recognize the complexities involved and seek a constructive approach."

"There is 'no such thing as a dollars and cents decision which does not have moral and human consequences,'" Grier said. He added, however, that it is too simplistic to simply cut off trade with the 95 countries on Amnesty International's list of human rights violators. "That's a copout," he said.

He urged that any corporate policy seeking to take a constructive approach to human rights to follow the example of the Royal Bank. His own company, he said, examines the effects of each transaction and the merits of the transaction in a human rights context. Corporations, he said, have the power to change attitudes of governments through their own policies.

Leo Casey, Vice-President of the U of T Graduate Students Union said his organization has been forced to withdraw its funds from the four Canadian Banks in the consortium currently lending large sums of money to South Africa.

If the Royal Bank followed its own policy it wouldn't have made that investment, he stated. Casey said there are grounds for the belief that some of the money could be going towards the development of nuclear weapons for South Africa. Information on the topic is hard to get he said, as the entire deal is shrouded in "a tight net of secrecy and confidentiality."

Pearson said Canada and other countries are unwilling to impose economic sanctions on South Africa as they need South African gold, diamonds and uranium. Any person proposing a blanket embargo of South Africa must be in favor "of a non-material society," he concluded.

OFS attempts to raise MP's consciousness

By ROBERTA CLARE

Approximately 100 students congregated in a mass lobby sponsored by the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) yesterday at Queen's Park. The purpose of the lobby was "to raise the consciousness of Ontario legislators to the problems of post-secondary education and collect information on the present state of opinion towards post-secondary education held" by Ontario's MPPs.

About half the 125 MPPs met with students from all over Ontario to discuss student aid, employment and the differential fee regulation on foreign students.

John Sweeney, liberal critic and MPP for the Kitchener-Wilmot riding, introduced the debate on student aid in the legislature. In response to attacks against the differential fee, Minister of Colleges and Universities Harry Parrott argued that the decrease in applications for foreign students to Ontario universities and colleges is not substantial evidence that the regulation is having adverse effects. Only enrolment figures, which are not yet available, would convince him of any detrimental effects, Parrott said.

Rebutting the supplemental question of the OSAP proposals concerning graduate students, Parrott claimed that the removal of the availability of loans and grants would have little effect.

Ted Bounsall, MPP for the Windsor-Sandwich riding and NDP critic, later charged that Parrott's arguments about statistics are "his stop-off way of handling the question." He added that "the 20 per cent drop in both applications and attendance of foreign students" is a clear indication of the necessity to eliminate the differential fee.

Moreover, he said, "close to 20 per cent of graduate students in this current year are receiving grants and if the program isn't changed in respect to eligibility they will be faced with severe difficulties."

Both the NDP and the OFS support the long term elimination of tuition fees. The NDP, Bounsall said, is "utterly opposed to the introduction of the eligibility period. We would like to see the parental contribution tables go drastically down." He explained the NDP party opposes tuition fees "because they add to the cost which is then compensated by loans or grants." Moreover, tuition "is a large disincentive to parents who want to send their children to university," Bounsall added.

The rally was attended by SAC's Board of Directors, its executive and student aid committee. Members met with Margaret Birch, Scarborough's MPP; Larry Grossman, MPP in the St. George riding; and Terry Jones, MPP Mississauga.

SAC president John Tuzyk commented that the lobby was "another tactic of applying public and political pressure." He continued: "It was good in that it directly presented the viewpoint of the students to the cabinet and legislature."

Mark McElwain of the SAC General Council met with backbencher Robert Elgie. Elgie maintained that the major objection of the public is that university students are "ripping off the system." Parrott, according to Elgie, is trying to create a system that will be acceptable to both students and the public. Parrott wants some sort of system that will be less objectionable, Elgie added.

He concluded that there seems to be some scope for change.

'Ya'll come back to Chapel Hill'

By LUCY WATROBA

The first half of the seventeenth annual North Carolina Exchange came to a successful conclusion Wednesday night when 39 U of T students returned home from the week-long visit to the University of North Carolina (UNC) at Chapel Hill.

The exchange, initiated by UNC President William Friday and former U of T President Claude Bissell, has as its purpose the promotion of understanding between the two neighbor nations.

On the way to North Carolina, the students visited Washington, D.C., where they toured various landmarks: Capitol Hill, the White House, the National Art Gallery, the Lincoln Memorial, and the JFK Centre for the Performing Arts.

In North Carolina, known as "the southern part of heaven," scheduled activities included casual get-togethers with the Carolina students. The visit coincided with the UNC homecoming weekend and U of T students watched a football game against Clemson University (South Carolina) and the choosing of the homecoming queen. Kenan Memorial Stadium was packed to capacity as the all-important game ended in a tie of 13 points, with the Canadians cheering UNC on.

Among the purely cultural activities were a square dance featuring a live bluegrass band, a demonstration of traditional clog dancing, a "pig-picking" and hayride held at one UNC student's country home and a service at Mount Zion Baptist Church, an experience in Southern black spirituality which all found to be uplifting.

The visitors participated in a set of special seminars on subjects such as Canada-U.S. relations, education and college athletics. American misconceptions of Canada were discussed in detail, and each student recognized his own stereotype and his stereotyped image of others. There was also a lively discussion about the South: Southern backwardness, Southern belles, Southern boys, and the Southern future.

U of T students wishing to participate in the exchange are interviewed each year and a selection, with the aim of achieving the widest possible variety of students from different colleges and different years is made by the organizers. They themselves are chosen from the participants of the preceding year's exchange.

The students are guests in the hosting students' homes, and meals are supplied through funds raised by the host university. This year, money for the 17-hour bus trip was partly collected from the participants and partly donated by the student councils of individual U of T colleges. The U of T students are now organizing fund-raising activities in order to welcome the UNC students in January.

The spirit of the whole event was captured by UNC spokesman Dr. Unks, in a seminar on comparative educational systems in the U.S. and Canada during the exchange. He suggested: "Your education is what's left after you've forgotten all the facts."

REMEMBRANCE

Canadian soldiers served with courage and distinction in the First and Second World Wars.

At Ypres, Vimy Ridge, Courcellette, Passchendaele and the Somme in France during World War One the Canadians established themselves as excellent soldiers.

This tradition was upheld a generation later when Canadian soldiers fought gallantly in helping liberate Axis-occupied countries across the European continent in World War Two.

Hundreds of Canadians sacrificed their lives in the Allied invasion at Dieppe in 1942. Although the operation was a failure it determined the critical strategy necessary for the successful invasion at Normandy in 1944, in which a number of Canadian soldiers took part.

Thanks to the bravery of Canada's, and other Allied soldiers, Canada has remained a free country. We enjoy many freedoms unheard of in the majority of the world's countries. The freedom to speak as we please, and the freedom to advance one's position through hard work, are two examples.

Our generation is lucky, too, that these freedoms have never been threatened and we have not been called on to go to war as our forebears did, to fight in the mud and trenches, and burned out shells of once mighty cities and towns.

Throughout the world, Canada has a reputation as a nation of peace and the present Canadian Armed Forces have upheld that reputation. Our peace-keeping troops have been chosen to serve in the Middle East, Vietnam and Cyprus, which have been hot-beds of conflict in recent history.

On this day we give thanks to those soldiers who have fought, and died, in defense of Canada's freedom. We will never take their sacrifice for granted.

Nazi Newreels

"We are the hollow men
We are the stuffed men..."
So it is with the response of Regis Films to their showings of The Nazi Newsreels of Joseph Goebbels. Advertisements for the film series are plastered about the university campus. On telephone poles, on mailboxes, on boardings already defiled by swastikas and white-power obscenities, the message jumps out at you: "Now for the first time, you can see authentic Nazi Newsreels produced by Dr. Joseph Goebbels, complete and uncut, exactly as they were shown to the German people..." Visions of carnival barkers appear in your mind's eye. "You will see crowds of people welcoming and chattering Hitler's troops as they liberate the Rhineland and Austria; you will see pre-Hitler Germany with its breadlines, prostitution, and social unrest contrasted with the order and vitality of the Nazi regime and you will begin to understand why the German people willingly donned the yoke of National Socialism." Fight to control the rising nausea and revulsion that you feel.

Hitler's troops did not "liberate" the Rhineland and Austria, nor did the German people and their neighbours "willingly" succumb to National Socialism. Your eye jumps to the final sentence: "If it does nothing else except make you suspicious of what you read in the papers, hear on the radio and see on television, this series will have accomplished a great deal." The sentence is, at best, ambiguous. One cannot help but be left wondering what it is that we are supposed to question. In light of the Nazi Newsreels are we now to seriously doubt all that we have learned about the horrors of the Nazi regime?

Delegations of concerned students and workers approach the administrations of Innis College and Regis Films, pointing out the inflammatory nature of the advertisement and suggesting that the message is an "insult and affront to Jews and all ethnic minorities," indeed, to "all those concerned about democratic rights." Letters and articles, filled with justifiable outrage appear in The Varsity. A demonstration is held outside Innis College, protesting the showing of the films considering the nature of the advertising for them. Only then does Regis Films respond.

Two statements are issued and distributed to those in attendance at the film. One reads in part: "Some people seem to have forgotten that the tragedy of that time affected all of us. By taking this collective conscience for granted we inadvertently contributed to that neglect by letting the promotion copy lapse into ambiguity..." We have reached the point where we now feel that in all respect we must add our name to the list of people protesting the ambiguity of the original pamphlet (sic).

The other statement is considerably less apologetic. "We regret," it reads, "any misconceptions resulting from partial reading of this program's advertising." Partial reading indeed! Which statement is it that we are to believe? Was the original pamphlet, in the view of Regis Films, ambiguous or not? Do they accept responsibility for the nature of the advertising, or are we to assume that the very ambiguity of the "apologies" is part of their campaign to make us question all that we read?

No. The actions of Regis Films to date have been irresponsible. They serve only to bring to mind the following lines:

... Alas!

Our dried voices, when
We whisper together
Are quiet and meaningless
As wind in dry grass
Or rats' feet over broken glass
In our dry cellar

Shape without form, shade without colour,
Paralysed force, gesture without motion...

Sensationalism

I'm responding to the petition-letter in the latest Varsity concerning the Nazi newsreels.

First of all, let me say how impressive it is that a protest movement can unite under one banner the Trotskyists, Zionists and the Alliance of Non-Zionist Jews. That's a coalition I don't expect to see linked in too many future protests.

Secondly, I don't think it's fair at all to intimate as the letter does that the sponsor of the series merely "claims" to have no connection with the Western Guard. I am quite confident that he does not.

What he can be charged with (and I think it is a serious charge) is sensationalizing in his promotion, seeking, whether naively or cynically I don't know, to employ the name of Hitler and whatever associations are evoked in people's heads by the term "Nazis" to attract customers to his films, and not merely in a case such as this of Goebbels' newsreels or Leni Reifenstahl's "Triumph of the Will" where to avoid mentioning that the work in question was Nazi would be a grave misrepresentation. Every time they have played Metropolis they have referred to it as "the film that influenced Hitler", which is not merely a dubious distinction to claim for a film many people regard as one of the classics of the silent era, but a very doubtful claim as well.

Hitler's politics were fully formed, (Mein Kampf for instance was already written) before he ever saw "Metropolis". And even in presenting a film like Triumph of the Will which Hitler commissioned especially, the tone in which the connection with the Nazis is spoken of in the ads is dangerously ambivalent — a kind of "come and be titillated by the horror and compelling excitement of early Nazi cinema." That kind of sensationalism I think ought to have no place in an ad of this kind.

Nevertheless I feel that the Nazi newsreels, and the Reifenstahl film, can be valuably seen for their historical and cautionary value. It is not a pro-Fascist act to arrange that they be seen again, and the implication that Regis Films may be Nazi-inspired but only claims that it is not is absolutely unworthy of the serious aims you claim to be serving with your demonstration and your protest letter.

Secondly, I have a serious question to ask of the protesters; will they picket as well the next time Battleship Potemkin or (to give a better example since it was made later in his career when only a wilfully blind man could have been unaware of the horrors of Stalinist repression) Ivan the Terrible by Sergei Eisenstein is shown? If they will not, then I suggest they are choosing their causes rather too fastidiously. Eisenstein after all (let there be no mistake about it) was a great director, but he was also a director who was capable of making films which brilliantly exposed the vicious repressions of the czars, but said nothing about the masses who were being starved, brutalized, tortured and slaughtered by the repressive state regime for which he made his movies. So how about it, gang? Are you really opposed to propaganda which invidiously supports a ruthless murderous and repressive state structure, or are you opposed to it only when it calls itself Nazi or Fascist?

Martin Heavisesides.

O'Riordan agrees

With regard to Rosemary Burton's letter printed in your November 7th issue, which denounces Mario Cutajar's continuing callous rationalization of various forms of mindless terrorism, I must say that I can only second her views. She also draws attention to the curious "musical chairs" nature of editorials, letters, opinions, etc. that are made to pass as the basis of the editorial policy of The Varsity.

For the reader, it is very difficult to figure out what is happening with a newspaper whose sometime editorials are written by staff reporters and whose Letters and Opinions pages are taken up frequently with lengthy dissertations by the editor on non-campus political issues. One can only hope that the largest student newspaper on campus and the one potentially having the most impact on the university community will eventually sort itself out in this and other areas soon.

More Opinions

NUS is them

The editorial "NUS—Not Us" is a very interesting editorial. It is very unfortunate that the author of the editorial did not bother to read any of the conference motions, material, or speak to anyone who went to the conference. The editorial is also sadly lacking in any type of understanding of what NUS has done in the past. It may be beneficial to explain what happened at the conference and what NUS has been doing since it was formed in 1972.

The October conference was planned as a strategy conference to finalize the plans of the May conference. The delegates identified unemployment and student aid as the two major issues. On unemployment, research was done during the summer on federal job creation programs and on the problem of after graduation unemployment. The first step that NUS took towards raising the issue of unemployment and student aid on campus was the card campaign done in September. Discussion will go on during the rest of this term on the short term demands for job creation. In the second term, the plans are to hold general meetings on campus in support of the NUS demands and to call upon the government to act immediately on the unemployment crisis.

The student aid campaign will be integrated into the employment campaign. It was felt that it was important to see these two issues together since they have a great impact on accessibility. The student aid campaign is calling for the federal government to provide a grant program in order that regional disparities in the student aid program will be eliminated. NUS will also be calling for specific changes in the Canada Student Loan Plan such as changes in the independence criteria.

The editorial also said that NUS is a do nothing organization — facts do not bare this out. NUS has been instrumental in obtaining major concessions from the federal government on student aid and employment and has also helped out provincial organizations in winning their fights with the provincial governments. One recent example of this was the creation of Young Canada Works last summer. NUS was the only group actively working for the federal government to get involved in job creation. The result was 33,000 jobs in 1977 that were not there in 1976. Although there are many problems with Young Canada Works it is easier now to work for the improvement of the program than to call for a job creation program. NUS also played an important role in rolling back the tuition fee increase in New Brunswick, last year.

As for the Ryerson referendum, 5 points were put forward by the anti-NUS campaign, all of them untrue. If the Varsity feels that this was a fair assessment of the organization then I would have to disagree. Intelligent criticism is always appreciated but uninformed editorials such as appeared last Friday do not help anyone.

Bookstore sale

Please pass on our apologies to Dennis Ostroff for causing him discomfort by allowing too many people in the G.S.U. gym during the opening day of the Sale. The problem was that everyone still waiting in the queue outside insisted that we were not allowing enough people in. I guess you can please some of the people some of the time, etc.

The Sale is unusual in that people arriving on Wednesday or Thursday will see as good a selection as those waiting Saturday morning, perhaps even better, we have so many titles that the gym simply isn't big enough to show them all. Three thousand fresh titles are arriving late today (Monday) and duplicates of almost all the titles we started with are arriving Tuesday. So come on back, Mr. Ostroff, it's much less crowded.

Now, incidentally, the $20,000 mentioned as profit is gross, not net. The cost of advertising, rental of the gym, cash registers, extra staff, bags, etc. all have to be paid out of that.

May I also offer a public apology to those customers who purchased "Atomic Dynamics in Liquids", advertised as originally priced at $67.50. I have discovered to my horror that the Canadian price was in fact $62.50. If any wish to return this book, we will certainly refund the one dollar.

Anarchists take stand on terrorism

The recent events surrounding the deaths of Andreas Baader, Jan-Carl Raspe and Gudrun Ensslin demand an anarchist evaluation of the role of violent struggle in capitalist democracies and also a re-statement of anarchist principles.

The sensational and hideously distorted picture presented by the bourgeois press is of little value in arriving at a rational appraisal of the self-styled anarchists of the Red Army Faction. The bourgeois view portrays them as middle-class radicals dissatisfied with the "easy life" turning to violence for violence's sake in the search for vicious thrills and ego-gratification. But alas, it is not that simple.

True there seems to be a marked lack of theory in the German anarchist movement but the idealism of the young radicals is plain. Bommi Baumann, a member of the June 2 Movement an anarchist group founded around the same time as the Baader-Meinhof group, in his book Wie Alles Anfang (How it Began) gives an autobiographical account of the forces which moulded an anarchist urban guerrilla in today's Germany. It was the sterile, joyless world of modern capitalism and the vision of a lifetime of meaningless toil for the enrichment of capitalist parasites that were the radicalizing factors in Baumann's life and the lives of the Baader-Meinhof group.

The Red Army Faction confronts the violence of the State with violence. The targets they strike at are the symbols of oppression: the capitalists, the police and the State. The system they seek to destroy is one in which a small group of people constituting the capitalist class exploit the masses for personal gain, a system where even the minds of the people are enslaved. The system they fight is one which treats people as commodities rather than human beings where production is for profit and not for use. The authoritarian family structure and relentless sexual oppression condition the workers into servile acceptance of these conditions. The spectacle of the workers of the world rallying around the "law-n-order" proclamations of the State, which means class law and the order of the prison, has all the tender charm of a whipped dog nuzzling its master.

But while we can understand the forces and frustrations that drive the German anarchists to violent struggle, in the final analysis we cannot support them. Attentat (political murder) has been discredited as an anarchist tactic since Alexander Berkman's ill-fated attack on Frick during the Homestead strike. Propaganda by the Deed is an elitist concept that denigrates the masses. The idea that the revolutionary by his sterling example of sacrifice can awaken the masses to revolutionary struggle is false. This is the ultimate aim of the German anarchists to rip off the smiling mask of tolerance from bourgeois society and reveal the reactionary visage beneath. Through this tactic they hope to rouse the masses to revolt ignoring the possibility of a right-wing reaction or perhaps worse the premature revolution that results in a mere game of musical chairs among the ruling classes.

This is not the Petrograd of 1917, the ruling classes are reasonably secure and as long as they maintain the loyalty of the armed forces they are virtually immune to armed struggle. In addition violence is the specialty of the State. They have an immense advantage in technology and manpower and the ability through the mass media of making even the marginal successes of the revolutionary counter-productive.

To have any hope of success we must operate in the open, forsaking conspiratorial politics. It is the nature of the State and the secret police to expect others to behave as they do: furtively and with cloak and dagger. It does not know how to deal with revolutionaries whose methods are the open and wide discussion of concepts of social change.

The fight against capitalism will be a long and hard one. It will be fought in the hearts and minds of the people not on the flight decks of jet airplanes.

As anarchists we are opposed to bureaucratic socialism, the most stifling of all political systems. We reject the parliamentary fetishism of the Marxist-Leninists and its inevitable product the revolutionary abortion a la USSR.

As anarchists we are dedicated to the elimination of coercion and force as legitimate tools of social intercourse. We work for a society of autonomous individuals based on workers self-management, mutual aid and free association.

The State and hierarchal alienated authority are the source of all social evil and the first task of any social revolution is the dismantling of the State and the bureaucracy. The most sinister alliance possible would be the combination of socialism and absolutism, to pervert the legitimate aspirations of the people for economic liberation and prosperity into a dictatorship concentrating all political and social forces in the State.

This is the future which the geriatric left of the Trotskyists, Maoists, Stalinists et al looks towards. The Russian Revolution failed miserably: it replaced czarism with state capitalism. It failed because of the tragic flaw in Marxist thinking: that the state, the tool of the oppressors can be used to liberate the masses.

The essential principle of anarchism is that mankind has reached a state of development at which it is possible to abolish the old relationship of master-man (capitalist-proletarian) and substitute a relationship of egalitarian co-operation. Since the State is the antithesis of egalitarianism it must be abolished and not seized as the Marxists would have us do.

It is the theory and belief of anarchism that the masses themselves must make their revolution. Not the Marxist revolution nor even the anarchist revolution but the people's revolution. Careerists, opportunists and statists must not be allowed to pervert the spontaneous urge towards freedom that is the driving force behind every revolutionary movement. POWER TO THE IMAGINATION! attitude his refusal to include in the SAC survival kit a pamphlet from SAC Women's Commissioner Caroline Caldwell and his alleged use of obscene language in an exchange with O'Riordan.

The local initially attempted to have the warning retracted without resort to grievance. When this failed the union filed a grievance form. Regarding Caldwell's pamphlet the union pointed out that Caldwell had failed to have the pamphlet ready within the time agreed upon by her and Cohen; consequently Cohen was being conscientious in refusing to include the pamphlet in the survival kit.

To the charge that Cohen had verbally abused O'Riordan the union replied that it was the other way round. During the exchange O'Riordan was reported to have told Cohen to "eat shit and die." Subsequently Cohen was informed that his attitude had improved and that the warning no longer applied. The union's request that the warning be removed from Cohen's file has not as yet been accepted.

• Rick Charney, an ex-SAC rep, was hired for a 10-12 week period to fill in for staff on holiday. The length of time for which he was hired meant that Charney came under the terms of the SAC-union contract. Charney had been working for six weeks when the union discovered that SAC was not sticking to its contract. He was being asked to work eight hours a day (instead of the stipulated 6½ hours). He was not being paid overtime pay. SAC agreed in this case to settle the matter informally. Two days before Charney ended his period of employment he received a $400 bonus, a sum considerably less than SAC would have had to pay if Charney had been paid according to the terms of the contract.

• On one afternoon during the heat wave that hit Toronto in July the temperature in the SAC offices rose above the 31 degree centigrade stipulated by the contract as the maximum allowed before the employer has to allow employees to leave work with full pay. AC first said that this stipulation applied only to the front office and then tried to move staff, together with some office equipment, into the basement which was supposedly cooler. Eventually the employees were moved to the Varsity's ad office which SAC believed to be air-conditioned. It turned out that the ad office was not air-conditioned. The SAC staff stayed but the union later on filed a grievance. SAC then studied the possibility of fitting air-conditioning in the front office at a cost of about $1,000. This was not done but the union claims that SAC's intransigency in this incident demonstrated SAC's willingness to waste money rather than deal fairly with the staff.

O'Riordan could not comment on these grievances claiming that they are as yet unresolved.

Architecture school makes impact on Metro

By CONNIE FILETTI
Work produced by U of T architecture students showed a "marked divergence" from the work established architects in Toronto were doing as early as 1940, according to Thomas Howarth, U of T Professor of Architecture.

Howarth was addressing a large audience Wednesday night at the Medical Sciences Auditorium on the influence of the university's School of Architecture upon the changing character of Metropolitan Toronto.

Noting a change from the Ecole des Beaux Arts system of architecture to the "commerce system" in the 1930's, Howarth said the U of T school tried to "get into the swing of the modern movement" by adopting such techniques as horizontality which "showed distaste for what had gone before."

He said this trend continued until 1946 up to which time the school began to influence the face of the city "very, very slowly."

Howarth felt the turning point in Toronto's development occurred in 1956 when a consortium of architects was invited to come up with a scheme for the new city hall.

"The situation in Toronto developed quite remarkably after the city hall competition. Before then Toronto was just a town. Urban design had hardly anything to offer but the competition changed all that.

Overnight Toronto became a city; overnight the character of Toronto changed dramatically."

Howarth also believes that work being done by U of T architecture students in the late 1950's anticipated later architectural trends in Toronto. He stressed their concern with materials, heights and continuity — qualities not considered by the "establishment" of the time.

Howarth pinpointed 1933 as the year real architectural concern for Toronto began. He credited Eric Arthur and Tony Adamson — U of T architecture students — with this achievement. He gave additional illustrations of U of T's impact on the architectural community.

York Lane, Fleming Park (one of the first housing developments to use underground parking) and the Courtyard Cafe all involved U of T School of Architecture staff or graduates, explained Howarth.

He also cited the Ontario Architects Association Building, designed by John C. Parkin and John B. Parkin of U of T as "the first modern building in Canada."

More recently, the new Metropolitan Toronto Library was designed by U of T graduate Raymond Moriyama, said Howarth.

Howarth emphasized the school's active participation in recent conservation of historical buildings. He noted the school played a vital role in stopping the demolition of Old City Hall and Union Station.

Howarth also stressed that an increased number of recent U of T architecture graduates have entered the world's of planning and politics. He termed this "unprecedented" and gave by way of example 1968 graduate Steven McLaughlin who acts as an advisor to Toronto Mayor David Crombie. McLaughlin's duties include giving policy advice on Toronto's waterfront, urban development and the revitalization of Yonge Street, Howarth said.

The university-run beverage service's failure to provide a bar at last Saturday's New College dance resulted in a loss of over $1,000 for the college council's Social Commission.

Beverage Services Manager Bill Paolini said the problem resulted from "human error." He explained he had filed the New College Dance under engagements for the following Saturday.

The lack of bar service resulted in an attendance of only 50 people. New College Social Director Mike Reid said he had expected a capacity crowd for the dance featuring "Joust." "The group has packed the place before," he said.

Although Reid budgets a loss for all dances, the shortfall of $700 in receipts at the door made the event a "financial disaster."

Paolini has promised, however, to compensate the New College Student Council fully for its loss. Paolini says the amount will be about $800.

Social Director Reid describes the settlement of $800 as "more than fair" and said that Paolini had been "quite decent about the whole thing. Nonetheless, the New College Student Council Executive met last night to discuss the offer.

Karl Marx in a quiet moment, works on his translation of The Philosopher in the Kitchen. Karl usually uses the British Museum, but when he's in town, he drops by the new Toronto Library. Why don't you drop on over to page 8 and find out all about Fort Book East.

Jack Wetherall gives a poignant and touching performance as an autistic child imprisoned in a closet for four years. An interview with the actor can be found on page 9.

Here Jan-Michael Vincent takes a somewhat hasty preview tour of the soon to be opened "Insect Village" at the Toronto Zoo. Noah would be pleased. Sorta. Hear about zany J-M's madcap escapades in the movie Damnation Alley by turned to page 15.

Film mythology and civil liberties

It has, mercifully, been some short space of years since the great days of book burning and banning, the Hays Office, and the Christian Ladies Temperance and Saloon League. And as complacency breeds as quickly as mosquitos in stagnant time, it is reasonable to assume that not a few of us were surprised on Monday morning when we discovered that not one but two film screenings had been the subject of demonstrations on the weekend.

In terms of content, and the spirit of the exhibitor, Cinema 2000's Snuff and the Regus Film's offering of Nazi Newsreels, are leagues apart. Snuff is notorious for being the first exemplar of the fabled pornographic genre (which lent the film its name, not the other way round) to be exhibited publicly in Toronto. Until this weekend, if we are to credit the legends, only several hundred dollars a connection, as well as security clearance could get the eager gore monger a seat.

Viewing the efforts of Goebbels' propaganda office has also been a rare experience recently (if you accept the over-frequent airing of Triumph of the Will). This may be a function of profitability.

Regus Films is guilty of somewhat prurient advertising. As Susan Sontag has pointed out to use the name Hitler, or the term Nazi often has the same shock-titilation value as 'parting thighs' or 'rampant prick'. The ads for Nazi Newsreels were something of a come-on but the essential thrust of the literature was to present the programme as an educational experience.

This is an effort particularly laudable at a time when Nazism and fascism are constantly points of reference in political debate and are increasingly demonstrations of the mythopoeisis of ignorance.

In the case of the weekend demonstrations, myth is the essential element. Myth grants Nazi propaganda and the snuff film their power over the imagination. And myth brought the protestors to the street.

CONCERNING THE ORIGINS OF SNUFF

First to the myths of Snuff. The snuff film is the pornographic movie taken to its logical conclusion: eros leading on to thanatos. In classic pornography the link between sex and death is always there. There are often deaths at the end of porno flicks. In the snuff film that death is purportedly real.

No one is quite certain where the first reports of snuff films originated. They filtered out of New York's haute underground two years ago. Sensational stories filled the tabloids, the connection between money and perversion made the tales more exciting. The films were supposedly to be the products of Argentina, where people disappear every day and torture is a way of life. That note, especially in the last days of Mrs. Person, gave the stories the ring of truth.

It was the investigative reporter's dream. Established papers and magazines from Playboy to Le Monde sent out search parties. Half the freelance journalists on this continent realized the possibility of instant fame and started snuffling about.

Strangely no one turned up anything. The only report which managed even a semblance of plausibility was one of a film made in the late fifties. It concerned two young women assaulting, mutilating and killing a derelict in San Francisco. The act was credited to (and acknowledged by) SCUM (the Society to Castrate Useless Males), the people responsible for shooting Andy Warhol a decade later. But it could not be rendered on demand.

The lack of evidence suggests a hoax, a large hoax perpetrated either by those who were merchandising porn, or those who were violently opposed to it and wished to stir public opinion against pornography in general.

After a few months the furor abated for lack of fuel. One of the legacies of that period is the film now at Cinema 2000. At the time it was a three year old standard capture and rape film which had gone nowhere. Some enterprising soul filmed an imitation butchery, tacked it on to the end and started marketing. Any demonstrations are a PR man's dream.

Subsequently it has appeared more likely that the original rumour emerged from the anti-pornography forces in New York. This is more than sad as they had created a myth more powerful than they had expected. And that myth had the power of incarnation. Within the last month a man was arraigned in the U.S. southwest on a charge of murder with reference to a snuff film. The body, this time, was produced. Without the myth he might have stayed sick but harmless.

CONCERNING THE MYSTIQUE OF NAZISM

Nazi propaganda films need no verification. They exist and have to be dealt with. They may be ignored, or burnt, or shown. Reg Hartt and Regus Films chose the latter.

Fascism and nazism are terms much thrown about for their value in engendering disgust and approbrium. It is impossible for any rational human being to object to the moral outrage which is inspired by memories of Hitler's Reich. The throwing about is however facilitated by absence of any coherent denotation — anybody may be called a fascist — I have, you probably have. But when you ask what the adjective, or noun may mean and clear answers rarely pour forth. Nazis are easier. They are defined by history, but, in general, our working knowledge of Hitler's Germany runs from Scant to non-existent, and is often founded on the opinions of film-makers, authors and those of the political inclination who have their own causes to promote.

Goebbels' propaganda films are historical documents and important ones. It may be that the rallying of an entire nation around a monomaniacal butcher is comprehensible to most people. It is difficult for me to understand. The propaganda office was in part responsible and to see its products is to gain in understanding. To wish to deny the cinema's right to show such films is to wish to cut off that possibility of learning.

But to deny the right to show these films is to affirm their power and to reinforce the status of Nazism as a great and potent mystery. What is not safe for us to see is tantalizing. One assumes that it's just as good as the heroin we were all warned about in high school — one hit and you're hooked. Anything that powerful is fascinating. And ignorance and mystery are great aids to those who desire power — you can build a church on it. Familiarity breeds contempt; knowledge breeds doubt.

CONCERNING THE CLOSURE OF A SOCIETY

There is a second major issue involved here: that old warhorse, civil liberty.

The reaction to Snuff is hysterical and cheapens the valid aims of certain elements of the women's movement by showing them in the grip of misinformation and playing into the hand of those who stand to gain by increased attendance at the very film they are protesting. There are reasonable grounds for arguing with such a film — it does exploit women and it does indicate the depths of a certain sickness in the society with regard to women. To fall prey to the myth of the snuff film is to confirm its existence and to encourage people who are deranged and have movie cameras to produce them. In point of fact there is probably little difference between the last five minutes of Snuff and the last twenty minutes of Looking for Mr. Goodbar except the quality of the effects. There were no placards protesting the latter.

The Snuff film presents significant difficulties for anyone who believes that movies, books and other art forms should not be banned or censored for their content or for any other reason. We may lament the fact that there is a market but I can see no way consistent with the ideal of the open society, in which such material may be kept from the public. The duty of those concerned is to calm themselves in the face of the public relations hype, to resist the lures which would induce them to publicize such films, and to investigate each film as it appears. If it is a snuff film in reality then the legal channels are open, and acting within the law is the best thing that can be done. To believe, as the protesters seemed to, that preventing the showing of such films will end their production is fallacious. A close look at their myths will tell you that.

The difficulties raised by the Nazi Newsreels are both more complex and more simple. There is no crime immediately involved in their showing. They may be the accessories to crimes both before and after the fact but no matter how many patrons they draw (and Regus films claim that no showing has sold more than thirty-five tickets) their money will not be poured back into production. The films have an educative value and should be seen. If their opponents believe that they will instill Nazi feelings into their audience it is a danger which must be run. Any art may move its audience to behavior of which no one can approve. SS officers read Rilke. Beethoven's Pastoral may make you feel like going off to invade Poland . . .

The question is one of consistency. One has always the right to protest, and to let the world at large know why something is objected to. To advocate the censoring of a film on the grounds that it is insulting or dangerous, however, is to open the floodgates. Who is to decide what may or may not be shown? In a society which shows everything at hand, some of its offerings are bound to be terribly offensive, but if someone is making the decisions to include or excise that person has an awesome and dangerous power. Would any of those who signed the letter in the Varsity enjoy a society in which everything was prescreened and censored by Anita Bryant, or Joseph Stalin, or Bill Davis?

There are situations in which censorship might be necessary but Canada in November, 1977, is not one of them. Freedom of speech and the freedom of the arts which follows from it is one of the most valuable assets to our society, as grossly imperfect as it is, has to offer its citizens. It's a freedom we haven't had for long, and one we should fight, as long as is humanly possible, to retain.

No one could write Das Kapital here

New library opens doors closes books

I don't believe in constructing a large space and then making partitioned areas within and calling them rooms. A room should be an extension of self. In a large commercial auditorium, I'd speak one way, but if I gave a talk in the Baptistery in Florence, I think I would say something I never said before.

In the above quote by Louis Kahn there is a notion of the kind of richness of experience one could have in a truly inspired public space. It begins to point to the kind of "public face" of man, which is only drawn out in special circumstances, when the expression of "our communality" may overwhelm you, where you begin to feel, and be quite other than when at home. This notion of the public sphere of life as being an enriching experience (because you are, as never before) is the concept, I believe the architect of the new Public Library missed out on, and hence, so do we.

The new Metro Toronto Public Library, at Yonge just north of Bloor was designed by Raymond Moriyama. It is dominated by a large sky lit full height open space. The individual departments are located on open terrace floors fronting on the oversized space; each is informally arranged with its own paraphernalia of desk, chairs and reference shelves. Reading tables are scattered about in a calculatedly casual manner. The large central space on the ground floor symbolically carrying the association of a public reading room is instead merely circulation space.

The image we may think Moriyama may have had of his (not mine-yours) library is of a large public space. But I believe that if we begin to examine it, that the acknowledgement of "truly public" begins to break down. In fact, the new library desperately wants us to feel at home. On its floors which circumvent open space, we are lead to believe through such objects as bookshelves — their size, the wood, and the width between units, that they are not much unlike units we might possess at home. In fact, each visible collection, in apparent size, is not unlike that of a single owner. The tables, scattered amongst stacks, amongst administration desks, amongst windows — a few here, a few there — set up very well the personal tone (never could you imagine that the could seat 1,305), prompting the notion that we could dig ourselves in for the night, roll over and almost belong.

Except, that it is not home. Why exploit the image? What does the building have to offer to us that our homes don't? One would hope firstly, that it would have all the books that we don't. And that somehow we were given the opportunity to come to terms with them. (There are 15 miles of bookshelves — only one third of the collection is out on display). And one would hope, understanding that it is not a lending library, that the least one could do, is to feel that it is a place to be lost amongst books, and that one ingredient might be: to feel oneself amongst an immensity and therefore to be seated there, quietly. Reading.

In architectural terms, the sense of open space, around which many group, tries to promote the sense of belonging to one, through a multi-layered mass. It tries to bridge the gap between the one — solitary, and the group. In the new library, this is nowhere evident. There is no place in which you are "just one", and then, "just one of many." You are always just one of the few. Who is to say that this ideal cannot be better worked than in, say, the reading room of the British Museum Library in which one feels the contrast between the narrowness and the maze-like character of the stacks, the open reading room, in which one feels like just a million other readers, with silence the communal bond. And, what of the "awesomeness" of the reading room, of people reading together vs. at home, curled up? Making the image of the new library a synthetic home is belying the public reading room image, where the large hall, full of readers, is so ominous, that it is almost sacred — why else whisper? (where else do you whisper?). This place didn't make me want to whisper, it is so pseudo-homey, that the public at large, can be forgotten. The small tokens of respect that we can show each other have no necessity here.

These types of contrasts, between feeling totally alone and almost lost among books, and then being so open, that communality is sacred, are the stuff, I believe our public experience could be made of, and of what the new library is not made. Therefore, it lacks guts. It lacks guts because it cannot deal with our communality, and the notion of how we all (not just a few) could and can work together. It is almost suburban, in that it rides on the hope of the pseudo-individual preference (you have 10 choices of where to take the book and none are really perfect.)

Why not then, just buy the book?

The kind of experience of studying or reading, when done a hundred-fold, anonymously, gives a sense, cosmic almost, of being a part. The British Museum Library staff are always proud to point out the chair that Karl Marx sat in while writing Das Kapital. And being there, working, in the same room, we feel a continuity in space and time.

Why then do we allow such impoverishment of our communal lives? The Yonge Street face does the most to meet an understanding of publicness in the city. Yonge Street will be canopied by awnings in the summer time (the library's gift), providing a sheltered way, relating to our storefronts in the area, e.g. Britnell's the store front of the library, though not yet all operating, begin to tell the story of our public lives — I am envious of someone reading the paper, sitting in a bent wood chair, drinking coffee, at the end of the day, at the library. It promotes a larger sense of urbanity, not to rush home, as if one was lost between work and home, at 6 o'clock — but to feel that one could have a part of the city and use it — and this, I believe contributes a great deal to the public life of the city at large, and helps us all. We might in fact, reorient the way we see things, we might finally begin to demand the "life-between" — the public life, between "just work" and "just home", which is after all the city's greatest capacity.

If this criticism can be seen as trying to understand what notions of "publicness" the new library tries to bring to our experience, then it would also be illuminating to see, on the opposite end of the scale, how politely it can deal with us, understanding, (even we do) that there might be thieves amongst us. Publicness, I suppose, means even thieves. That's the risk over being private. Medieval cities for example are built almost totally with security in mind, or at least that is how we read them whether it is effectual or not, we at least all know that it is one end. A moat is a moat, it is water with terrible consequences, if you fall in. The walls are heavy and have few openings (sound like the new library?); it can be said to be literally or figuratively someone's stronghold.

The new library also has certain security ends that it has to meet. It was built, especially with this in mind, for it has a no-lending policy. Whether security is handled in a heavy-handed modern artillery way (such as Fort Book) or whether the checks are softer, I think that it is all fine as long as we are dealt with straight forwardly, urbanely at best, prompting best relations among men. But in the new library, the public, instead of being dealt with in some urbane way, with conventions and politeness, is almost not acknowledged. (if that is what you can call, insidious checks.) Is the fountain and pool by the main entrance that separates you from the library proper a gesture of pleasantry? or is it simply a disguised moat with goldfish. It is strategically placed to guide and hinder movement. Water's inherent qualities of tranquility, reflectiveness, sound, light etc. have not been exploited, for it is not placed in such a way that we might sit nearby, or that it may be an integral part of reading. Another worry, or clue is those push bars at the entry, for they make almost no sense. They have no weight, they are too easy to push open (wind could almost do it) and they don't fall back into place. Security, crowd control, or what?

The general reference reading room, on the first floor, seems to present this anomaly most clearly, for it is surrounded by a barricade of wooden shafts, which seem at first glance to be falling apart, as their undulation sweeps around. Your immediate connections are of a temporariness, of Polynesian bamboo hut restaurants, but never of impermeable wall. (They are after all, embedded in concrete.)

And then the poor little man — is he really the only one — who has to check everyone, their books and their bags. He seems, on first glance to be the only security the library has. Really?

Yes, in the end I agree that it is a bigger risk and larger chance you have to take when you deal with all of us, when you acknowledge both our communality and our disparity. Yes, you might even have to watch out. But that is our potency, and the fact that the new library never acknowledges the power we have, altogether, and the kinds of ways we could feel about it, again makes me feel that it is gutless, and devoid of city-sense.

The semi-colons of Architecture

Ever had problems seeing eye-to-eye with a new building? With First Canada Place, or the Bank of Commerce at Bloor and Yonge, or Sid Smith? Take heart for you aren't alone. Although that fell beast Modern Architecture has wandered among us for most of this century most of us still can't see the Toronto Dominion Centre as anything except three shoe boxes stood on end (sizes, 7, 12 & 56). It seems that despite the best efforts of Bauhaus, we are not convinced that a radiator is more aesthetically interesting (or socially relevant or consciousness-raising) than a bouquet of plastic flowers.

Charles Jencks has long been an admirer and perceptive critic of this century's buildings. His Modern Movements in Architecture is one of the finest concise histories of the subject. In his new book, The Language of Post-Modern Architecture, however, he announces the death of the Modern phase and cautiously notes activity in new areas as he proposes his own theoretic.

Jencks' central focus is not on the death of a style (which someone is bound to resurrect anyway). His concern is communication. The question he poses at each juncture is "What does it look like?"

It seems an obvious question as it sums much of what architecture is, but it is one that Modern Architecture has largely buried. Images of form have been neglected in favour of concerns with industrial processes. That's fine to a point but industrial processes are often mistaken or properly understood as expedient and arrogant blocks with about as much reference to people or the world around them as your average orange crate. Certainly a geometer understands the pure volumes of our bank towers but how do we?

Jencks breaks down his discussion of communication into four modes: metaphor, what it's like; words, the every-day things with which the whole is explained (or yesterday's metaphor becomes today's conventional word.); syntax, the rules by which something is put together (gravity, joinery etc.) and semantics; the meaning and tone of a particular word. With those four terms he constructs his argument about how we 'read' a building.

From there Jencks begins to map out areas of work that start to describe a renewed concern with architectural communication: the Post-Modern. He suggests that there isn't enough built to call it an approach or style but then again he'd rather there wasn't. Jencks' whole point is not to document a new style but to suggest and hope for a new pluralism.

One of his previous books, Adhocism, written with Nathen Silver is a story about using the things at hand, things intended for other uses to solve problems. The reuse of the object puts it in a new light thus adding a new complexity to its meaning. Largely, The Language of Post-Modern Architecture is an extension of the adhoc ideal. As Jencks believes that the adhoc creation is much more meaningful (because it retains its previous story of use), the Post-Modern building (if it exists) does the same as it envelopes 'metaphors' and 'words' from world around it. It is no longer the cold, arrogant creature making reference only to itself but rather it is open and suggests a number of images and references.

Like the first part of this article, Jencks' description of Modern Architecture is (as he states) a caricature, nearly parody. Jencks has a great appreciation for architecture, modern or not, but his demand is communication. He prefers not the 'death' of modern architecture but rather its consolidation; we need not build everything in the moralist, cataclysmic mood of the old modern architects.

Adolf Loos' Chicago Tribune Building: a newspaper column?

Jack Wetherall acts in a labyrinth of possibilities

"When I go to the theatre I like to be reaffirmed in my belief in people, in my belief in life. When I go to a circus and I see people doing fantastic things or when I go to the operating room and see open heart surgery where the surgeon is stopping a girl's heart, closing up a hole in the heart and starting it again, I think, my God, people are incredible. We are amazing. We are capable of so much."

Although Jack Wetherall's words flow easily through his mellifluous middle range, the young Canadian actor's enormous blue eyes often tend to communicate more than his tongue. His affection for the late Powys Thomas became obvious as he stared wistfully out the restaurant window. "Powys was my first, and probably my greatest teacher. When he died I thought the whole country would mourn his loss but it went by very quietly... He was a beautiful man. A poet."

In his own person Jack exudes a genuine sincerity and warmth which has a habit of carrying over onto the stage. His movements contain that attractive self-consciousness which one generally associates with adolescence. He looked for all the world like a picture pasted on a Betty Crocker pastry package as he eagerly leaned forward, awkwardly holding his dessert fork at the bottom awaiting the moment when he might politely pounce upon his strawberry tarte. These "boyish" qualities have often been noted in his performances. John Fraser writing in the Globe and Mail about his performance as Ferdinand in The Tempest reflected that it was "boyishly infectious." MacKenzie Porter writing in his own inarticulate style in The Toronto Sun about Jack's performance this summer at Stratford as Orlando in As You Like It stated: "Jack Wetherby looks too boyish and sometimes sounds too inarticulate to make a plausible suitor to the mature Rosalind in the role of Orlando." I disagree. Somehow, Jack's personal humility succeeds, for me, in filling out such underwritten romantics as Orlando, Ferdinand and Demetrius. Robin Phillips has found a valuable commodity in Jack Wetherall.

The awkwardness of Jack's adolescent posture, however, remains purely a physical pose. Very quickly one begins to realize that there is a serious mind ticking away with ferocious determination behind the pretty boy exterior. "Although those roles (the young romantics) have a certain kind of interest for me, I'm much more interested in exploring character work. I think I'm starting to realize the dangers in being cast in particular roles and not in others. If you can't be satisfied with the kind of exploration you do in one place then you have to leave. I've done it before and I hope I'll continue to do it." Jack knows what he wants and he intends to get it.

The only son of a Sault Ste. Marie working class family, Jack became interested in the theatre when he got involved with amateur dramatics. He became hooked on acting while studying at university and finally was consumed by the profession when he was taken on as a journeyman actor at Stratford in 1972. Jack's passion for the theatre is obviously sincere. "I've got an argument with a lot of the Canadian theatrical community," he jeered with increasing intensity, "because a lot of them don't understand the importance of training, of technique. They believe in tuition and inspiration. That's not enough. It's really not enough. The level of work will not improve here until they understand that it's a lot of bloody hard work to be an actor."

Jack believes in practical preparation for his roles. In preparation for his performance as Dr. Victor Von Frankenstein in an original adaptation of Mary Shelley's classic novel at Montreal's Centaur Theatre, Jack attended an open heart operation at a local hospital. "An element of danger is absolutely essential to good theatre. The wonderful thing about going to the Sick Children's Hospital in Montreal and watching that heart surgery where they actually stopped the heart was that it was a question of life and death. I thought, my God, if this is happening in modern day society where does theatre fit in? Why is theatre important for people if it doesn't court the same element of risk? It's very easy to eliminate the sense of danger in theatre. There are a lot of ways of instilling a false sense of danger like three weeks of rehearsal when you know that nothing is going right. That kind of danger is foolishness. The thing that was marvelous about Poland and Russia when I went on a winter tour with the Stratford company was that they rehearsed a minimum of three months. There was no question of people getting bored with the work or fear that it was going stale which people often say here. They (Canadian performers) just don't understand the nature of our work."

Wetherall inspires confidence through his spontaneous sense of integrity. When Robin Phillips asked him to join the young company in his first year as artistic director at the Stratford Festival Jack refused. The young actor's dedication to his idea of good theatre and to his concept of a consummate professional actor is awe-inspiring. "I was expecting a young company where the key word was 'risk'. But the young company was an attitude as opposed to a real company as such. I think that young company, in my understanding of the word, is yet to be found at Stratford. I simply went into Robin and explained that I couldn't accept his offer of medium size roles. I said that if I had not been there three years prior to that one, doing the kind of work I was doing, maybe I could have accepted it but now I knew I had nothing to offer him. I had to go out and bite off a large piece of good substantial meat and chew on it and, perhaps, choke on it, but I had to satisfy myself and he accepted that. So, in a way, I would not be doing large roles at Stratford without Robin, but, at the same time, there is a certain amount of initiative on my own part which took me away from the place and brought me back."

I cannot imagine that Jack is a comfortable person. He thinks too much. However, I have no doubt that he will, someday, be a great actor. (Please note I do not say a great "Canadian" actor, rather a great actor who will be able to stand on any stage up against any performer.) Why? Because he thinks enough. "This whole year I've gone through a really serious time of self appraisal where I've really had to look at myself. I've really questioned being an actor, questioned my talents as an actor. So much of my last six years of work, although I was aware of certain problems, has been got through by a sheer sort of energy, of enthusiasm. That has got me through very bad times. Yet, the more one understands about the art and the technique and the difficulties of the life of being an actor the more you turn in on yourself and begin asking a lot of questions... I want to be an actor who has an understanding of where he's going. I want to be an actor with a path to failure that allows me to get better."

Not surprisingly, Jack is in Toronto to appear in a play in which he believes very strongly. It is a play which fulfills his need to make both a statement about contemporary society and a theatrical impact. The play is Peter Handke's Kaspar and Jack is performing the leading role at the Cafe Soho. Handke's play concerning an autistic adolescent existentially lost in a space with only one sentence to call his own, and his unsuccessful struggles to coincide with the clichés of social normality represents a metaphor for our generation. In this battle, Jack has fought against commercial compromise. The young actor is using himself to colour his performance. "I've developed, I've matured, I've had more life experience. My resources are bigger now that I've had a long time to think about the play. (Jack played Kaspar for the first time in Montreal last year with great success. "What is success anyway?") The second time the play is much more difficult. The intricacies, the possibilities of doing the show are infinite. It is a labyrinth of possibilities. I'm still looking for Kaspar, however. I've lost something, my belief for Kaspar, because we've had a constant dosage of the show for the past few weeks. We've rehearsed endless hours to the point where I'm sick of it almost. I have to get back from it. But with three weeks rehearsal that's impossible because you want to use the time to its maximum advantage." Nonetheless, Kaspar, a play frequently paralleled with Beckett's Waiting for Godot in importance, cannot fail but to be a meaningful and entertaining experience both for the performer and his audience.

Appel dapples in kid paintings

World War II left many Europeans with a painfully vivid stigma — a reminder of the games that adults play. COBRA (Copenhagen, Brussels, Amsterdam) was one group of artists who emerged from this post-war disillusion with a set of rebelliously cheerful alternatives. The most successful Cobraite is the Dutch painter Karel Appel (pronounced apple), whose art celebrates the games children play. In fact, his work virtually appears to be 'child's art' in its rudimentary treatment of subjects such as horses, cats, mice, and heads. And yet it's sophisticated enough to earn international fame and merit a major exhibition at Toronto's Gallery Moos (pronounced Mose), continuing until November 24th.

As a branch of abstract expressionism, it is often difficult to discern the subjects of the painting. Chinese Girl with Cat, for example, appears to be merely a wash of bright oranges, reds, and blues. Unsophisticates are tempted to say, "But even I could do that". But Appel gives us a thread to follow. He broadly outlines the colours with a darker line of paint, making it possible to perceive a large cat knocking a girl to the floor. Vibrant strokes of colour sweep in one direction to simulate the force of impact, as the girl supposedly hits the floor. Still I have to admit, it's a relief to have an accompanying title, to tell the eye what it is supposed to be seeing.

Appel's work has had its share of brutalization as well. A mural which he once painted for an Amsterdam canteen was assaulted soon after, by several diners who unappreciatively threw their lunches at it. In a sense, this reaction precipitated the process which Appel recognizes in his artistic career. "For me," he explains, "painting is destroying what I have done before."

It is undeniable that many of the artist's earlier experiments should have been trashed. New York galleries carried several collage pieces which mark the low point of his oeuvre. A high point was the commission to paint murals for the Paris UNESCO headquarters, along with artists such as Picasso and Miro. A high point for Canada was his recent donation of 250 artist's proofs of his graphics and his personal collection of deluxe books and portfolios to Hamilton's new gallery — a rare privilege for Hamtown.

Appel is a street artist. The streets of New York provide him with colour, inspiration and surprisingly enough, a sense of harmony. The broad expanses and cityscapes of the States and Canada offer spatial freedom, which the cramped and confined Holland couldn't match. Some of the paintings to emerge from this influence are the head paintings Deux Personnages, Couple, Smiling Heads and Big Bird with Blue Head show that Karel needs only the head to portray emotion. There is an exuberant devotion to intimacy but we are poignantly aware that Appel remains only a voyeur. The coupled heads are either engrossed with each other or stare blankly over their shoulders toward the artist. These encounters are, however, rendered with a frank brilliance, much like the untainted perception of a child. We are nearly fooled into thinking these are all happy paintings.

Emotion translates into texture and colour for Appel, and he describes painting as a passion and a "tangible sensual experience". The simplicity of his paintings is therefore misleading. His complex and heady awareness of the disparity between the exaggerated parts of the body seen in a child's painting and the churning emotions below it, is what he tries to capture on the canvas. Like children's paintings he fills every inch of the canvas with paint. Colour in this way fends off nothingness.

Two distinct styles of Appel's work appear in the Gallery Moos exhibit, both arrestingly bold. Paintings such as Parrot with Green Flowers exemplify a hard-edge, partially representational approach, much like the fauves in the use of strictly primary colours. Here the colours are painted onto the canvas. Others, like Flying Landscape, and Deux Personnages display a smothering attack of the canvas. The paint is squirted from the tube in swirls and squiggles until a suggestion of the subject is visible. Thick gobs of paint always appear luscious and delectable. The appeal is appetizing but Appel merely explains that his "paint tube is like a rocket which describes its own space".

One of the paintings is particularly disturbing — a piece called Witness in which the face of a man appears blaringly naked. All the colours are treated with black and the eyes are circular infernos. The rest of the paintings are far more playful, as are the textile and tapestry works. Marshall McLuhan is a great admirer of this element of playfulness in Appel's painting — an element which he believes is one of the major roles of art. Certainly the observer does reap delight from the curious angular and very pagan ceramic sculptures such as Horse, or the vibrant Heads in Springtime in which the heads are either distorted by spring fever or have transformed into exotic flowers.

In the fast-paced business of the city, little is conceded to emotion and cheer. It can be said that Appel concedes too much. But the intriguing and ultimate irony is that his 'child's art' is born amid the sights of the city streets.

U of T history as drama

Canadian history always struck me as the least dramatic of all subjects. Until I started to see plays. To see James Reaney plays. Reaney rescues Canadian history from its phlegmatic closet without the smallest trace of silly Canadian humility. So maybe there were only 700 students involved in U of T's first student strike in 1895. So the dismissed professor that The Dismissal is based on retired to his father's farm shortly after his brief confrontation. And so what if our country's most Flamboyant politician, William Lyon Mackenzie King, was nothing more than an opportunistic ass. Buried beneath these facts, Reaney finds comedy, pathos, tragedy, an energetic people and individual heroism. An obscure episode in a university's history thus becomes a subject for drama.

It's easy to enjoy NDWT's production of The Dismissal at Hart House Theatre. It's irreverent, unabashedly slapstick in places, occasionally lyrical and with a disposition much like a lightweight revue. Moreover, even though the play is set in 1895, the issues surrounding the student strike are still alive today, although the disco-punk-backgammon world of our university might be unaware of it. Foreign domination of teaching posts, freedom of speech and political debate, and academic freedom are the issues that caused all but four students out of a student population of 700 to stop attending classes. And the comedy is built from the fact that the students, professors and administrators taking themselves so seriously then, are today's stereotypes and just as prevalent.

Reaney, however, goes a step beyond history for comedy's sake or comedy to make history more digestible. He is a master of surrounding facts with a particular mood. The Dismissal, for all its contemporary flavour, always feels rooted in 1895. The intellectual ambience, student life, songs and personal concerns of the characters are infused with late 19th cent.

rationalism. And even in staging the play the director Keith Turnbull has preserved this crucial point by making certain that if a 19th century university classroom sequence is called for, then the intellectual timbre of the lecture hall is just right. There is no need for time-place continuity or narrative-action separation if the audience is given the character and temper of the 1895 strike. In fact, Reaney's mellifluous weaving of narrative and action is what makes The Dismissal so easy to like.

But it also reveals Reaney's weakness as a dramatist. It's not just critical carping to say that some people come away from The Dismissal with a feeling that various parts of the play mesh more like soggy cornflakes than precise dramatic thought. Keith Turnbull and his cast have done a fine job in bringing energy and life to this complex play form. In the interest of creating mood, however, too much is made too often of little events or ideas. If a supreme turbulence were guiding the play, then these sideline events would be like brush strokes to a painting. None of the characters, nor any single idea is able to sustain this necessary drive towards some climax. Professor Dale or the Varsity editor Tucker's integrity could have provided this force. But Reaney has chosen to dramatize the events of history at the expense of revealing the humanity and complexity of either one of these two figures. The Dismissal suffers from the syndrome of the linear hero. Reaney the dramatist sometimes loses sight of Reaney the poet.

Harry sings! Gord talks!

Some musicians saunter on stage, mumble a few short but cool phrases, blurt out their latest hit song, collect a token encore, then make a bee-line for the bank. Not so with Harry Chapin. He is an entertainer extraordinaire, if only because of his intense sense of what is ordinary.

Chapin did three shows last weekend in a typical burst of energy that saw him do two radio interviews, one hop to New York and media promotion of his pet social cancer, world hunger.

Monday's show saw him gather a rapt Massey Hall audience onto his lap, open his anthology of "stories" and successfully manage to convince everyone that what they were listening to was new. No one lamented the fact that it wasn't.

He scoffed at a Toronto reviewer who said he "cuddled with the audience". So midway through the concert he turfed his audience off his knee, back into their respective seats, and presented them with a few new things to ponder.

Chapin transplanted his stories from their completely romantic origins into an exploration of the changing relationships between men and women — a feat he managed to pull off by focusing on both sides of the coin. That is, he did several groups of songs, looking at situations from first a man's point of view, and then from that of a woman. The result was not a serious dogmatic assault on liberation or chauvinism. Instead, it was an intriguing example of his ability to perceive a serious situation and weave a web of humour around it.

The audience settled back with their inhibitions into a most comfortable mood that was heightened by Chapin's lapse back into the realm of predictability. Perhaps realizing this, he retreated to a corner of the stage and rummaged in his bag of tricks and came up with nothing less than a Gordon Lightfoot, the Gordon Lightfoot, live and in stumbling colour. Shyly, yes, shyly, he did four less than memorable numbers. The Lightfoot voice was not up to par. But he talked! The Lightfoot of limited word, the cool Canadian hero himself managed an amazingly acceptable patter with Chapin and received a standing ovation for his efforts. As for Chapin, he just sat back and grinned, "No one will accuse us of not giving you your money's worth".

Everything said to this point ignores one facet of the concert — what about the music?

Chapin has a strong instrumental back-up, but unfortunately for them, the intensity of his lyrics distract attention from their talents, and they fade into a pleasant atmosphere at his rear. At times they emerge to compliment Harry, or to foil his incessant banter with knife-ish comments. But their musical support is vital to Chapin's presentation. The instrumentation sets the mood, his lyrics express it, and together merge into an easy listening experience. Ears are never challenged or offended by the music, mostly because minds are completely preoccupied by the intuitive lyrical content.

Harry Chapin is not afraid of hard work. He puts his all into his concerts and deserves to be recognized and applauded for that, as much as for his talents.

Mozart for the dyspeptic

The current Northstars Mozart Festival, not to be outdone by homages to Brahms or Beethoven, continued its run last Saturday with a concert devoted to wind music. The works chosen represented facets of Mozart's instrumental genius, from open-air to chamber pieces.

His Divertimento in B Flat Major for two oboes, horns and bassoons (K.230) is, as Lister Sinclair suggested in his lightweight introduction, music to digest by. This is no reason to treat it as routinely as the performers did, with no variety or rubato. But worse was the balance, which so favoured the first oboe as almost to give us a concerto. Music for indigestion, rather; maybe it would have sounded better in the outdoor for which it was composed. Rowland Floyd, principal oboist of the NAC orchestra, was the culprit. He is no doubt an excellent player and possessed of a ripe, even over-ripe tone, but on this showing he is too straightlaced and insensitive for chamber music. Was it the acoustics, I wondered, since the horns (George Stimson and John MacDonald) were muffled and the bassoons (Gabor Janota and James McKay) often inaudible — except that Nancy Bourdon, the other oboist, also tended to get lost under Floyd's plangency.

The same trouble plagued the next piece, the Serenade in C Minor (K.388), and frankly made it impossible to enjoy the music. What could have been achieved was amply shown in a beautiful blend of second oboe and bassoon in a variation of the last movement, and again, for example, by James Campbell's phrasing in the Minuet.

But enough carping (for the moment). There was some delightful playing in the second Divertimento of K.4396, scored for two clarinets and bassoon (Sinclair misidentified it as K.288). In this exuberant piece Mozart allows each instrument an equal say in the proceedings, and the players presented its genial conversation cum song in the proper spirit of fun, as they did two arrangements of arias from Figaro and Don Giovanni which followed. As a conclusion pianist Patricia Parr joined to play in the E Flat Major quintet (K.452), in which the oboe legitimately leads, but shouldn't dominate. Once he had found his music, horn-player John MacDonald gave what seemed to me a sensitive performance. Owing to a bad instrument, bad acoustics, or simply to overpedalling, the piano sounded backward and muddy in tone — an odd effect in music where the danger is that the modern piano will drown the others. Mozart aims above all at a concertante style, winds and piano in balance, as in the concertos of the same period. This did not happen. The Quintet like the evening as a whole was a thing of shreds and patches. In any event, festive Mozart comes back to life (we hope) in the next concert of the series in January.

A zipless concerto

Massey Hall habitués should all be happy, for one of the most curiosity-satisfying events of the week was the debut performance of Martha Argerich, the Argentinian pianist known to many not only through her various recordings, but also through sundry intriguing accounts of her rather flamboyant personality. All gossip aside, there is no doubt about the fact that this talented ex-Horowitz pupil plays with a subtlety and expressiveness not always found in the playing of many of her contemporaries.

This was especially evident in her performance of the Mozart Piano Concerto in C Major, K. 503 on Tuesday evening. Not one of Mozart's "zipper" concerti, this is a difficult work to pull off, especially for an audience that is relatively undemonstrative even at the best of times. The opening thematic material, for instance, is fairly conventional, and the real delight of the work is to be found in its manipulation of related major and minor harmonies within a larger structured framework. This harmonic subtlety was brought out especially well in the plethora of passagework for the piano, all of which displayed a good sense of direction and shading.

The orchestra reciprocated this feeling for the most part, although they at some points would have been well advised to emulate Argerich's phrasing more closely. There were some really sublime moments in the first movement particularly in the transitional section of the recapitulation which takes us to the restatement of the second group. It would have been more fun to hear a cadenza other than the one by Gulda, which must have been chosen only for its brevity.

The remaining two movements were performed with equal success due to Ms. Argerich's sense of line in the second movement, and a real feeling for the "sonata" aspect of the final sonata-rondo movement.

Also gracing Tuesday's program was another preview of an upcoming TSO recording special — Janacek's Taras Bulba. This was almost ship-shape, although I found myself wishing rather perversely for more Janacekian lugubriousness. At any rate, this recording when it comes out ought to make an interesting addition to the burgeoning record collections of Davis aficionados.

The Fourth Symphony of Schumann formed the last half of the program. Perhaps not everybody's favourite Romantic symphony, this work can be criticized for its repetitiousness and tedious use of sequence, particularly in the opening movement. Nevertheless, the TS seemed to be able to pull this work together. There were some good contrasts, especially in the Scherzo movement, and the trombone trio held its own in the Langsam introduction to the final movement. This rather active movement, replace with fugato and bustling passagework brought the concert to a satisfying close.

Dorothy DeVal

"Let the music play itself"

Sir Edward Elgar's advice to interpreters of his own music could provide a helpful suggestion to conductor William Phillips: let the music play itself. In Friday's New Chamber Orchestra concert Mr. Phillips' treatment of the program could be summed up in one word: insensitive.

The St. Paul's Suite by Gustav Holst, which began the program, is a delightful work written for the orchestra of St. Paul's school. It demands a light touch in order to allow the melodic lines free rein. Mr. Phillips attempted to infuse more drama into the piece than it was able to sustain. The essential fact concerning English music of the type heard in this concert is its lyric or melodic character. If a conductor loses (or ignores) the conception of line in these compositions, they tend to become a series of harmonies existing in a sort of limbo. Interpreting Holst a la Carl Orff, or Vaughn Williams a la Stravinsky is bound to miss the mark. This was the basic flaw in Friday's concert.

The continual emphasis of the dynamic and rhythmic structure of the compositions resulted in a harsh string tone and lack of balance. This was particularly true of the Concerto Accademico for violin and strings by Ralph Vaughn Williams. The soloist, Steven Stryk, was not given a sympathetic accompaniment. This was particularly annoying in the wistful second movement. There is an essentially mystical quality to this section of the work, which was entirely lacking as it was presented.

Sir Arthur Bliss' Music for Strings quite simply was not ready for performance. Any sort of comment which I could make on the work would be in the vein of a Kiwanis Festival adjudication sheet; hence I shall refrain.

The best work of the evening was in the Concerto Grosso Op. 6, No. 11 by Handel. The woes of the evening tended to be mitigated, especially in respect to volume, thus revealing a quite acceptable string tone. The tempi, again, tended to be fast. This in fact was one of reasons for many of the troubles evident in the concert. Some of the poor ensemble and ragged entries could be directly linked to the speed with which the selections were played. And the melodic qualities of English music which I mentioned earlier do not seem to be compatible with a break-neck tempo.

The concert was held in the Parish Hall of St. James Cathedral. The acoustics of this room are similar to those of a fifty gallon oil drum. The treble was lost while the sound from one double bass was far too evident. The harpsichord might well have been left unused in view of its lack of audibility.

Friday: Lumiere opens the week with two Italian comedies Alfredo, Alfredo, and Divorce Italian Style. It may be that this school of film will be the next camp vogue but let's hope not. The New Yorker pretends to rock'n'roll with The Bowle Wonder, Rod Stewart and the Faces, and A Film About Jimi Hendrix (which is almost enough to make you wished you'd died with him). The Roxy tries to pawn Zeppelin's The Song Remains the Same off on somebody. For dedicated students of film, however, the place to be is the Science Centre which is in the midst of its Mauro Bolognini retrospective. Foxe like you and me don't know anything about him but, given the prospectus we've received from the Italian Cultural Institute, he appears to be both a vital link between the neo-realists of the 50's and the unnameable style pioneered by Fellini and Antonioni in the early 60's, and a major artist in his own right. Tonight it's L'Assoluto Naturale and La Balena Bianca.

Saturday: The New Yorker (oh come off it guys!) has Young Frankenstein and Phantom of the Paradise. The Revue has to hymns to the human spirit Stay Hungry and Pumping Iron. The Roxy offers Kubrick's Clockwork Orange (which must be dog-eared by now) and Roeg's amazing Performance which has never received the recognition it deserves as a text on the wracking of nerves.

Sunday: A problem. Innis, if you're not boycotting Regus Films on the grounds that they're a form of typhoid Adolph, has Superman and Popeye cartoons at 2:00, Buster Keaton at 5:00 and Stella Dallas (a.k.a. Barbara Stanwyck's finest hours) at 8:00. The AGO has Franju's Therese Desqueux and Chabrol's Le Beau Serge (the latter without subtitles). Lumiere has two Sunday dinner specials The Seduction of Mimi and La Grand Bouffe. The New Yorker pulls up its cultural socks (a bit muddy after the last two weeks) and offers a pair of superior biographies one (Arthur Rubenstein) for the joy of life, the other (Edvard Munch) entirely empty, and a greater film for it.

Monday: The Roxy has Truffaut's almost interesting Story of Adele H. but refuses to bill it with Histoire d'O — for all reason they think Wertmuller's All Screwed up is more suitable.

Tuesday: If Innis hasn't been bombed the screenings of the Nazi Newreels will continue. If you have problems in distinguishing one totalitarian act from another remember that the evil destroyers of your mind are on the screen and the saviors of your free and democratic rights are the ones blocking the door. The New Yorker has Walkabout and The Discreet Charm of the Bourgeoisie (you can walk out halfway through).

Wednesday: Lumiere has Visconti's sadly underseen Sandra together with Bellocchio's China Is Near. And it doesn't seem fair to me that the New Yorker once again rises from the mud to give unfair competition with Black Moon and Phantom of Liberty. If you really want to know what else is going on look somewhere else.

Thursday: More Bolognini at the Science Centre: Metello (reputedly his definitive work) and L'eredita Serranotti. Lumiere has Malle's documentary Calcutta together with an entry in the political consciousness derby (a little long in the tooth by now, grey hairs flecking the flanks...) Angela Davis. And the New Yorker closes out the week's activities by reverging to Americana: Bound for Glory and They Shoot Horses Don't They?

Pretty soon I'll have to demand the freedom of Reg Hartt and Regus films but, for the moment only Wayne Kramer commands our support.

Why am I never prepared for the good ones? Last Sunday Peter Frankl played an original, brilliant, and powerful recital. He should have been reviewed.

Nothing tonight. Weekend Family Pops action at Massey Hall states soprano Rosemarie Landry for some Mozart and Korngold arias. Fearless Feldbrill conducts; tomorrow at 7:30 and Sunday at 3:00.

Sunday in Walter Hall the Orford Quartet plays the next-to-last program of its outstanding Beethoven cycle. Starts 3:00, students $4. At eight the Hart House Sunday Evening Concert offers a rare chance to hear a harp without Debussy or Das Rheingold. Judy Loman gives a solo recital of transcriptions and original works, including the Hindemith sonata. Musn't be missed; tickets free from the porter.

Monday's organ recital in Convocation Hall features Jeannette Taves playing Bach. Starts 5:05, $1 at the door. That evening in the St. Lawrence Centre's Town Hall the Vancouver Chamber Choir sings Palestrina, Brahms, and Britten. Begins at 8:30; student rush $2.50 at eight.

Tuesday afternoon in Hart House, tenor David Falls sings Schumann's entire "Dichterliebe" cycle and some Britten folk arrangements. Music Room at 1:10.

"My girlfriend's so dumb she puts her contraceptive jelly on her toast". If you think that's funny you should catch Yuk Yuk's Comedy Spectacular at Con. Hall on the 24th. Of course, if you think that's funny you'd probably have just as much fun staying at home teasing your ironing board.

But seriously, the music scene for the next little while is fraught with boredom. The only deal around is the Weather Report concert at Con. Hall on the 27th. The tickets are a negligible five buckaroos at the SAC office. Following them is the pulchritudinous Cano on the Dec. 4th.

In the heart of the Big Cabbage, Styx will be at the Gardens on the 17th, Murray McLauchlan will be at Massey Hall on Dec. 20th and the Good Bros. will be at the same spot on the 18th of this month. Apparently Klas is holding out for the entire Eaton Centre. No date has been confirmed as yet.

At the clubs things are almost as bad. Larry's, in keeping with its policy of only hiring the mega-stars of the music industry, has Sledge in tonight. The Jarvis House, that have of sanity, has Bananas. The El Mocambo has Burning Spear, the Midwich Cuckoo has Lisa Hart, the Gasworks has Small Wonder, the Riverboat has Dave Bradstreet and the Tube has Streetheart.

It would seem that your safest bets for an evening of anti-conscious hilarity are Dizzy Gillespie at the Colonial or Joe Hall at the Horseshoe Tavern. The Chimney has started to hire New York New Wave bands, but their first offering is the Boyzrhythms. Stay clear. These boys make B.T.O. look good.

In the vicious rumour department; apparently the Viletones are playing the Yonge Station. I'll believe it when I see it. Apparently Mississippi Joe White may be returning to Grossman's. Keep your fingers crossed.

But for all you kids who are afraid to leave the sanctity of this great institution, Dr. John's (U.C. Refectory) has Joust tonight. You might be better off rotting your brain on disco at Cheeks.

(Thanks extended to Mike Scott for making this poor soul's burden a little lighter).

jazz

Hello Jazz Fans!!! Count Basie and his Orchestra hit town on Wednesday Nov. 16 at the Minkler Auditorium, Seneca College, at 8:30 p.m. This is the first of Minkler's concert series, which features, as well, the Maynard Ferguson and Buddy Rich big bands in December and February respectively. Subscription tickets are $21 and $18, singles $8 and $7. For ticket orders and information, call 491-8877.

Official news from Dave Caplan, booking agent for Yellowfingers: the club will definitely resume its jazz policy as soon as the outside construction is completed — probably no earlier than mid-December. (Editor's Note: Don't hold your breath.)

Chet Baker (trumpet) continues his stay at Bourbon St. until Nov. 20. I'd appreciate hearing from anyone who's sat in to hear him.

The great Dizzy Gillespie, co-originator of be-bop, plays tonight and tomorrow at the Colonial. The cover charge should be a whooper, but he's worth it.

At George's, bassist Gary Binstead leads his quartet until Saturday. Next week, Moe Koffman brings in the quintet to do his regular monthly gig. I suppose Moe is an excellent flautist, but somehow he never manages to excite this listener. On the other hand, with musicians like Ed Bickert on guitar, Don Thompson on keyboards and Marty Morell on drums, he's got one of the finest groups in the city.

Vocalist Ernestine Anderson finishes off the week at DJ's, followed on Monday by Vic Dickenson (trombone) and his quintet.

The Fred Stone Sextet (trumpet) plays after hours tonight and tomorrow at Cafe Soko, 334 Queen W. On Thursday, the solo piano work of Fat Clemence. 862-0199.

On Tuesday at 5:30 p.m. the Museum hosts the Kathryn Moores Quartet (flute and occasional vocals).

Wednesday at noon features the Harvey Kogen Quartet (sax) at Hart House. Free!!

art

Karel Appel, the Dutch COBRA artist, has an exhibition of paintings, sculptures, gouaches, and graphics at Gallery Moos till Nov. 24. Ostensibly termed "child's art". Students' art is featured at the AGO in the exhibition Canadian Paintings in the University of Toronto, which drew together works owned by various colleges, and executed mainly by Group of Seven artists and contemporaries. Till Nov. 20.

British watercolours by J.M.W. Turner, William Blake, and others at the National Gallery in Fonctionnaire City, (The Big O.) Till Dec. 11. Also till Dec. 11 at the National is Another Dimension with sculptures by Michael Snow (more walking women?), Norman White, Ian Carr-Harris, and Murray Favro.

Our Toronto equivalent for "acceptable art", the AGO, continues its Impresario — Ambrose Vollard show, with help from Picasso, Renoir and Munch. A truly commendable exhibition exposing one of the most interesting men of the Paris art world pre-WW2. Till Dec. 4. Also showing, The Drawings of Henry Moore including a superb series of life drawings of his wife Irina. Till Dec. 31. Halifax artist Gerald Ferguson's experimental art continues till Dec. 31 as well, but he's now firmly entrenched in the bizarre as you'll see on Thursday, Nov. 17 where he will lead a choral reading called "An Abridged Choral Reading of the Standard Corpus of Present Day English Language Usage Arranged by word length and alphabetized within word length 1970". Reading begins at 8 p.m. in the AGO Walker Court.

Kim Ondaatje, well-known Canadian poet, opens a multimedia exhibition at Scarborough College Gallery on Monday. Meet him at 8 p.m. on Monday. The same day opens a new pottery show at The Pottery Shop on Avenue Road, and a choice of 11 potters. Till Nov. 30.

Davis Mirvish Gallery has recent paintings by Daniel Solomon till Nov. 29, and photography by Carol Marano till Nov. 16. Recent paintings by James Gordaner, at the Merton Gallery till tomorrow, include some fine large works. Will Ogilvie's paintings and water colours also close tomorrow at the Roberts Gallery and are worth seeing. Richard Sewell's hand-pulled prints at the Albert White Gallery have superior technique but dull composition. Till Nov. 23.

Peter Flinisch, who contributed photomontages to CBC's coverage of the Olympics last summer, has some sensual drawings grouped as Around the Body. Till Nov. 26. Watercolours by Toronto artist, Walter Concell will open tomorrow at the Prince Arthur Galleries. Till Dec. 7.

Looks like Hart House has chosen well for its new show opening on Monday. Expressive Realism by artist R.F.M. McInnis is what we all want to achieve in our essays but that he's mastered on canvas. Till Dec. 2.

New Works by Redinger at the Isaacs Gallery include a seething mass of striped sculptural forms. Sensual and summy but not very good in the living room. Till Nov. 19. Andre Fautaux has seven steel sculptures at the Sable-Castelli Gallery which seems to undulate as you circle them. Both shows stand highly recommended. Till Nov. 12.

Student prices are $3.4, Tuesday-Saturday at 8:30 and Sunday at 3 p.m. At Schubert's Cabaret, Marlene, Marlene, another vehicle (and how that word can get you into trouble) for Dorothy Poste, who starred in Plaf. Call 961-2460 for prices and reservations. Kaspar is now open, an adaptation by Alexander Hausvater of Peter Handke's play. Jack Wetherall does not use it as a vehicle, merely plays Kaspar. Hmnn. Call Theatre Passe Muraille for reservations, 363-8988; shows are Tuesday to Saturday at 8:30 and Sunday at 2:00 at the Cafe Soko, 334 Queen Street W.

At the Royal Alex, The Circle, Somerset Maugham's long-lived comedy. Monday to Saturday at 8:30, Wednesday and Saturday matinees at 2:30. At the Theatre in the Dell, a new cabaret show, Sweet City Lights opens next Thursday at 9:00. Monday to Thursday, shows will be at 9:00, with 8:30 and 10:30 shows Friday and Saturday; but on campus that same night, New College presents Neil Simon's God's Favorite. Three nights only. And to backtrack, Cruel Tears picks its way into town, a Saskatoon Othello with music by Humphrey and the Dumptrucks. At the Bathurst Street Theatre, Tuesday to Friday at 8:30 and Saturday at 5:30 and 9:30. Matinees at Wednesday, 1:30, and Sunday at 2:30. Next Friday, three one-act plays at the Theatre Nextdoor, 240 Wellesley St. E. (Vancouver Building), at 8:30. A mere $2 admits you to The Case of the Crushed Petunias, Tennessee Williams, Chekhov's Marriage Proposal, and Saroyan's Hello Out There. Call 483-3995 between 5 and 8.

Reminders that Reaney's Dismal is doing nicely at Hart House and the playwright will be speaking Thursday the 17th at one o'clock in the Hart House Library on his play.

P.S. Christopher Fry's A Phoenix too Frequent and Tennessee Williams' Suddenly Last Summer open at the Scarborough Theatre Guild. Call 751-6509 for information.

The aesthetics of a nuclear holocaust

The film Damnation Alley is one of those very important fusions that occur in great art. This time it's the fusion of monster flicks with war films. Sure, you say, it's been done before. Of course, the U.S. army is always fighting giant ants and green blobs, in movies like Return of the Killer Boogie and other classics. But movies that follow always have an advantage because they can always plagiarize the effects of the last one and build from there. Damnation Alley has stolen the best, added a magnificent surround sound system and voila, a truly anti-conscience movie, perfect for the kids and late-night television.

I am thinking of setting up a non-credit course at this university: the Aesthetics of a Nuclear Holocaust. This film could provide all of the teaching material. First of all, the preliminaries, i.e. the missile attacks and retaliatory strikes, are done in magnificent yellows and oranges, turning to gruesome yet awesome blacks. The sound is both frighteningly loud and physically involving.

After the fighting dies down, along with most of the planet's life-forms, the after-effects come into play. The few survivors of a U.S. missile base decide to set out looking for more epigoni. On their journey they encounter giant scorpions, killer cockroaches, mutated hillbillies and some very interesting weather disturbances.

It is this last aspect in which Damnation Alley really triumphs. We observe electrical storms with angry red skies and flashes of crazy ball lightning. They use colours like Kelly green and baby blue to make skylines which are both unreal and frightening.

The kids will love it.

But there is, as in all movies of this type, some deeper meaning. Don't play with bombs. I was moved. It was extremely poignant.

So go see Damnation Alley. Better yet, wait till you get married and have kids (probably not more than two years from now) and let the little rascals stay up late one night to watch this classic on the late show.

Mulock Cup: A Fitting Climax For Scar.

By HUGH STUART

Well, yesterday's interfac football final proved two things. The first was that winter is on its way (it was cold). The second was almost as much of a foregone conclusion as the first: that Scarborough College has the best football team in the interfac 'A' division. Playing on a mud puddle slightly resembling a football field, the Maroons relieved the downtown campus of the hallowed Mulock Cup as they recorded an impressive 15-1 victory over the Papal People Eaters from St. Michael's. Although the outcome surprised few observers, until Russ Henderson returned a punt 105 yards for a touchdown with less than a minute left in the first half, the game was very much in doubt.

St. Mike's got a taste of things to come on their first possession of the game when running back Kevin MacKinnon was stopped cold on a third down and one yard to go gamble. The Maroons' ensuing possession resulted in a single point on Jim McLeod's wide field goal attempt. His chance was set up on the strength of strong running from the Scarborough duo of Henderson and Shad McKee. St. Mike's can be thankful that the Maroons' drive didn't result in six points as the ref called back a touchdown scamper by Henderson.

With the score at 1-0, SMC came back with a drive of their own. Quarterback John Leon passed to MacKinnon for ten yards. A penalty moved the ball further down field but the drive stalled at the Scarborough thirty yard line. Leon punted and SMC's Steve Lyon made a solo tackle on Henderson (no easy task) behind the goal line to knot the score at 1-1.

On the strength of the running of the 'choir boys' workhorse running back, Andy Lubinsky, St. Mike's was moving the ball well and appeared to be taking command of the game.

True to the script written by Scarborough this year, it was a 'big play' that broke the game open. With less than a minute left in the half Henderson took Leon's punt at the five yard line. Behind some good blocking, Henderson displayed the moves that have easily made him the most valuable player in the league this year. Finally with nothing but open field in front of him he turned on the after burners and easily outsped the SMC backs. McLeod converted Henderson's major and Scarborough went into the dressing room with a seven point lead.

The less publicized but equally effective Maroon defense look over from the offense in the second half and kept St. Mike's off of the scoreboard. This was difficult in view of the inside running of Lubinsky and MacKinnon and the reverses of Mike Trudel. However Scarborough's swarming defence was more than equal to the task.

The only touchdown of the second half came midway through the third quarter. McKee was the work horse on this one as he gained large chunks of real estate up the middle. But again it was the 'big play' that kept the drive alive as McLeod left the pocket and scrambled fifteen yards to the SMC twenty five yard line. A few plays later Henderson capped the drive with a seven yard run off tackle. McLeod added the convert to make the score 15-1.

The final quarter was not a demonstration that befits the championship game of a highly competitive interfac football season as the game turned into a comedy of slips, slides, fumbles and incompletions. Nevertheless the Maroons escaped with their fourteen point margin of victory.

In the final analysis, Scarborough coach Jon Dallandrea hit the nail on the head when he said that it was Henderson's punt return that turned the tide; "Until that point we hadn't really got off of the bus. St. Mike's is a fine team though."

It's not often that anyone catches Russ Henderson from behind, but here St. Mike's linebacker Steve Lyon puts the grab on the speedy back.

For St. Mike's there is always next year, for Scarborough there is the burden of defending their Mulock Cup. Regardless of their success, hopefully next season will duplicate the excitement and quality of play that was exhibited this year.

New Overcomes Mud and Rain to Take Division 11

By JIM O'LEARY

New College became Division II Mulock Cup champions in a game which will probably be remembered more for the driving rain and muddy conditions than for any exploits on the field. Behind a solid running game, New defeated Dentistry 14-0 in the game played on the back campus yesterday afternoon. Rain throughout the week turned the back campus fields into a quagmire, making it impossible for either team to show the talent that got them into the final. To make matters worse, the players were greeted with driving winds and heavy rains in the second half.

The conditions made it obvious the team that could mount the most consistent running attack would probably win. True to form, New's running game turned out to be the decisive factor.

New romped for close to 200 yards with a balanced running game featuring B. Colm and C. Muir. Dents on the other hand had trouble getting their running game untracked.

Dents' inability to run was somewhat surprising considering the ease by which they ran against University College in the semi-final. Last week their wishbone attack was unstoppable, leading them to a 25-0 victory.

New got on the scoreboard in the first quarter on a three yard plunge by quarterback D. St. John. The play capped a march which carried the New offence the length of the field. Muir kicked the convert giving New a 7-0 halftime lead.

New came out running in the second half and got strong inside yardage from fullback Muir and excellent yardage from the outside running of Colm. The explosiveness of Muir accounted for the second New touchdown.

Muir took the ball off tackle and romped 49 yards into the endzone. He then kicked the convert to give New a 14-0 lead.

Dents made a valiant comeback attempt but were thwarted by a strong New defence and their own blunders. The rain and mud made the ball too much for quarterback C. Morgan to handle and resulted in fumbles in key situations.

The game was tough throughout, and it took the firm hand of the officials to keep things under control. Three players were tossed out. J. Tonelli was thrown out for intent to injure when he was caught kicking a Dents player. Muir of New and F. McKinley of Dents were thrown out for exchanging punches.

Fumbles were the order of the day throughout the Dents-New game.

Blues Start Slow But Rally To Blast Ryerson

By HOWARD DEANE

The Varsity Blues, after an unimpressive first period, rammed home 9 goals to beat Ryerson 10-2 in an exhibition game played at Varsity Arena on Wednesday night.

The Blues struck with their balanced attack, as nine players accounted for the ten goals. In all their games the goals have come from a variety of players, rather than a selected nucleus.

Coach Tom Watt, is continuing to use his European style of play, adapted for the Blues. He uses five man units playing together for much of the game. These units rotate in a regular fashion so that most players get equal ice time.

The first period is one Blues would just as soon forget. They were lucky to head to the dressing room with a 1-0 lead. Both teams played defensive hockey, not trying to break open the game.

Ryerson played this way because they had to. "They played conservatively and waited until we made mistakes," Coach Watt stated; and Toronto "found it difficult to get up for an exhibition game that was of little significance. If we lose, we are bums, and if we win we are not great because we only beat Ryerson."

Defenceman Charlie Hughes opened the scoring in the first period on a blistering shot from the blueline. This was the only scoring in the first period and the Blues went into the dressing room with a 1-0 lead.

The Blues came out strong at the beginning of the second period scoring twice in two and a half minutes. After two close scoring opportunities, Ron Harris hit on his first of two goals, just one second after a power play had ended.

Doug Caines scored what provided to be the winning goal, a minute later on a set up by Dan Tsubouchi and Rob Gemmel.

Both of the Ryerson goals came in the middle of the second period only 27 seconds apart. Toronto's Joe Grant drew a five minute major penalty for high-sticking a Ram player, and 14 seconds later Sam Smith scored on the power play.

Ryerson's first goal had come only 13 seconds before the penalty, as Mike Clark picked up the loose puck in the Toronto zone and clearly beat Toronto goalie Dave Jenner with a quick shot to the corner of the net.

For the remainder of the penalty Toronto looked like the championship team they are. Playing shorthanded they checked strongly and thoroughly outplayed the Rams. It took a major penalty to get the Blues fired up. From here on they never looked back.

Less than two minutes after the Rams had closed the score to 3-2 Cary Farelli put Toronto ahead 4-2 on a shot that trickled under the prone Ryerson goalie. Rob Adoranti, playing a variety of lines due to the injury of his winger Jim Snetsinger, closed out the scoring of the second period on a pass from Dan Tsubouchi.

The third period had the Blues at their finest. They outshot the Rams 30-6. Over the game the Blues outshot them 65-26.

Toronto was assessed another five minute penalty in the third period when Wayne Morrissey was called for crosschecking Mike Clark. The Blues handled themselves as well as they had done on the first major penalty and held off the weak Ryerson attack.

Alex Jeans scored the fourth goal on a power play shortly after the penalty to Morrissey had expired. This goal was set up by some good passing and puck control by Rocci Pagnello and Larry Hopkins.

The other four goals during the third period were scored by Neil Korzack, Dan Tsubouchi, Ron Harris and Dan D'Alvise. Of the seventeen Toronto players on the ice Wednesday night, sixteen had at least one point.

Both Charlie Hughes and Dan Tsubouchi had a goal and two assists while Rocci Pagnello and Larry Hopkins both had two assists. Neil Korzack and Alex Jeans added an assist to their goals, while Frank Davis, Wayne Morrissey, Doug Herridge, Rob Gemmel, and Brad Tamblin each had an assist.

The Blues with wins of 7-1 over Laurentian, 8-0 over Western, 11-1 over Laval, and the recent win over Ryerson are looking for the season to be a prosperous one. The toughest opponents that Toronto will face this year will be their cross-town rival York. In their only encounter this year York won a closely fought battle 4-3.

The Blues meet the Guelph Gryphons at Varsity Arena at 8:00 pm tonight.

Alex Jeans (20) puts the puck in the vacant Ryerson net as Rocci Pagnello and Cary Farelli look on.

Chesler slams Marx dogma

By GILLIAN O'REILLY

A clash between left-wing feminists and American psychologist Phyllis Chesler occupied the second half of a lecture on "Women, Money and Power" at Convocation Hall on Friday night. The 37-year-old author's discussion of her latest book turned into an argument over Marxism in feminism.

Chesler was the second speaker in The Emerging Women lecture series given by the Women's Fundraising Coalition. The coalition raises money for women's groups around Toronto to tide them over between grants.

The first hour of the lecture was taken up by Chesler's somewhat rambling interpretation of the relation between religion, psychology and money. This system of values prevents women from achieving power, Chesler claimed. Women are conditioned to see "God as male and man as God-on-earth."

Escape from this belief involves great psychological terror and loneliness. Chesler also stressed that the label of insanity can be and is applied to women who speak out for feminist causes.

Successful women, said Chesler, dissociate themselves from other women and adopt a masculine image, even to the extent of wearing three-piece suits. They do not like to be associated with "victims" and "losers." Even so, society's attitude is still one of "she has a pretty good job, for a girl," Chesler commented.

Women are also caught up in the myth of money as "nasty" or "dirty." They do not admit the existence of the "productive nature of female labor," Chesler maintained. Even though a woman may have just cooked a dinner for 10 people in two hours, she will still say, "Oh, it was nothing."

In the course of her speech, Chesler stated that no revolution in this century has furthered the advancement of the feminist cause. Her assertion resulted in heated opposition from several left-wing groups during the question period.

With no chairperson to supervise discussion, Chesler and her opponents resorted to drowning each other out. Several of the more moderate people in the audience grew tired of this and left before the end.

Chesler said she had already heard the Marxist position and did not want to hear it again. She complained that it is "romanticized" and that left-wing feminists are just "dutiful daughters of Marxist rhetoric." When one of the Marxists in the audience claimed that workers suffer the same violence women are traditionally subjected to, the audience responded with derision.

The discussion ended when a spokeswoman from Women against Violence against Women exhorted everyone to join a march to the theatre where the movie Snuff was being shown. Chesler endorsed the demonstration saying that "pornography is the propaganda and rape is the practice." However, she cautioned that it was dangerous to demonstrate against something "you haven't checked out."

Chesler herself was active in 10 days of demonstrations against the movie in New York. Subsequently a number of groups were set up to deal with the question of pornography.

The evening ended as a group of women left Convocation Hall bearing placards one of which read "Give Men a Curfew."

No riots yet over drinking law

By ADAM KNELMAN-OSTRY

Last Thursday marked the beginning of the end of the status quo as Queen's Park gave first reading to the Bill raising the drinking age from 18 to 19 in Ontario's liquor establishments.

First reading passed by a vote of 72 to 29. The implications of the bill, according to a Globe and Mail report, are the people who are 18 now be allowed in bars but those who are not yet 18 will have to wait until they turn 19 to partake in any drinking activities.

The dozen or so pubs on the U of T campus which are sustained by a clientele of university students, some of whom are not yet 19, may well be affected by this new law. Next year students who are 18 in their first year may not be able to go to the pubs. A more strict surveillance of these establishments will have to be undertaken to insure that they are operating within the law, intimidated Vic pub manager Michael Greason.

He stated that the law wouldn't really change things so far as his establishment was concerned. "We'll just have to check ID more carefully, that's all. The real problem lies with certain establishments which don't check their patrons' ID carefully enough. If bar owners would simply try to keep the under-age people out now, there would probably be no need for the present law."

Greason mentioned "establishments in this neighborhood which do not make any effort to keep obviously under-aged high school students off the premises." He added that once the Bill becomes law, "we'll have to start watching for people. But it won't make much difference since the 18-year-olds make up substantially less than half the population of freshmen. This year they can still be admitted anyway. Quite frankly, I have seen many 17-year-olds trying to get into my pub."

Over the past weekend a Students Administrative Council (SAC) pub, an Innis College pub as well as the Vic pub took place. A young woman at the SAC pub stated that although she was 18, she would still continue to go to drinking establishments. "They're crazy if they think they can make the law stick. Do they really think that anyone who has been waiting patiently for their 18th birthday to arrive only to find that they can't drink is going to shrug his shoulders and wait patiently for another year to go by? No way. They'll do what they've always done — drink with false ID or get kicked out of bars a lot," she said.

One of her friends said his younger brother in high school "drinks with his friends in several establishments around here — and he'll most likely continue to do so even though he is not yet 18."

At the Innis pub, students laughed at the suggestions that people would stop drinking because of the law. "People under age have been drinking in public for man years and one more year won't bother them much — some of them will be frustrated but that will be the worst of it," one student stated.

defects transmitted between generations and even better food crops, but we run the risk of worldwide epidemics from newly created pathogens and the unforeseeable consequences of tampering with evolution, stated Sinsheimer.

The philosophical difficulty of reconciling anticipated risks with unknown benefits in the search for new knowledge was the theme of the lecture. Sinsheimer began by reading from Bertolt Brecht's play, Galileo, about the seventeenth century scientist's discovery that the earth revolves around the sun. Galileo's research endangered the social and religious order of the day.

Sinsheimer pointed out that the issues have changed in subtle ways since Galileo. The appearance of new knowledge still causes bitterness by upsetting old dogma. However, we are now dealing with knowledge which could alter the life structure on earth, he said. If we recombine DNA molecules to generate new species, we become creators. The new life forms developed will be capable of propagating themselves in ways we cannot predict nor control. Similarly, a nuclear holocaust could result in destruction on an unprecedented scale.

Sinsheimer believes that great faith in the resilience and benevolence of nature is needed if this sort of research is undertaken. He feels there is a degree of "hubris" in pursuing knowledge to this extent.

The "Galilean Imperative" is that force which drives man to expand his knowledge under any conditions, Sinsheimer said. He thinks this force is particularly strong in the twentieth century and pointed out that an estimated 90 per cent of all scientists that ever lived are alive today.

How do we deal with the elevated status of knowledge? Sinsheimer suggested a number of alternatives to the human problem besides seeking further truths. Rather than focus on our lack of knowledge, we could concentrate on its use in our political and social organizations, said Sinsheimer. He strongly emphasized the need for interdisciplinary studies to improve contact and understanding among the sciences, arts and politics.

During the question period, Sinsheimer suggested that restraint on potentially harmful research could be achieved through controls on research funding, ethical restraint within the scientific community, and a limit on the number of research laboratories.

Sinsheimer spent over 20 years deciphering the DNA molecule. Now, apparently, he realizes the fantastic implications of his research and has turned to restricting further work in the area.

In 1976, he testified for a U.S. House of Representatives subcommittee on scientific research, warning of the possibly dangerous consequences of genetic engineering. In his speech on Wednesday, he cited a number of physicists who had anticipated the dangers of nuclear research as early as the 1920's, years before Hiroshima.

Sinsheimer said he hopes to anticipate the consequences of genetic engineering in order to avoid a biological disaster.

The second last regular weekly contest is now underway. Bring in your submissions by this Thursday, 1:00 p.m. and you might be the lucky winner of a pair of tickets to the SAC-Q-107 Comedy Bowl live at Convocation Hall on November 27th as was Mark Gatti, last week's winner.

Get out there and create ART!

The consensus among the weekend pub-goers appeared to be that while the law would be tough on the 17-year-olds things would go on as before.

"The law is just another example of a reactionary government yelling 'stop it' at the people and getting laughed at right in its face," said a student at the Vic pub. "No one cares, and except for the cops, no one gives a damn either."

The Varsity — Tim Fletcher

Any day now some of these patrons might be breaking the law. If the new drinking age law passes third reading those under 19 will have to do their drinking in more private abodes.

Creative writing a spark in need of focus

By PETER HOENADEL

"This university should get off its laurels and help organize student writers," said Ed Jewinski, co-ordinator of the poetry series at New College, during an informal discussion on creative writing held at Hart House Library last Thursday night. Jewinski lamented: "There's no way campus writers can get together. There's no communication between one group and another."

U of T writer-in-residence Carol Bolt agreed with Jewinski's assessment of these organizational problems with creative writing. Despite having only two months experience at her new post, Bolt said she felt there were many individual creative outlets on campus "but no central focus."

Bolt recounted her own days as an undergraduate at the University of British Columbia and her experience with its creative writing course. Unlike one of her more critical teachers of that time, Earl Birney, Bolt believes that her role as a writer-in-residence is to be enthusiastic and to look for good points in a student's work. "If I had listened to Earl Birney," she said, "I would have found myself in the Faculty of Education, preparing myself to be a grammar teacher."

Various outlets for creative writers on the U of T campus were discussed. Phil Brown, editor of the U of T Review, said the Review was designed to encourage contributions from everyone on campus. He suggested that the editors of all the campus reviews form an editorial board as a means of co-ordinating student writers. Brown added that the U of T Review is trying to counteract the preponderance of poetry submitted by holding a fiction contest this year with a prize of $100.

Jewinski said that students interested in writing could go to off-campus readings such as those at Harbourfront, Three Schools, and the Neill-Wycik residence at Ryerson. These regular readings draw large crowds and a wide variety of talent according to Jewinski.

Bruce Meyer, editor of Acta Victoriana, found that a spirit of "cautious conservatism" is becoming apparent in student submissions. The avant-garde phase of Acta Victoriana which peaked in the early '60s (when Margaret Atwood and Dennis Lee were editors), has been replaced by more conventional methods of production and versification, said Meyer.

There is still room for innovation in Bolt's opinion. She spoke of the success of various small magazines reproduced on mimeograph machines and crudely bound. They are still a viable means of promoting creative writing on campus, Bolt said, concluding that "if the creative spark is there, it'll happen."

This is BIG-DECISION-MAKING time. Be there. Only full-time politicians need attend.

Solid no to French

By SA'AD A. SAIDULLAH

Response to a task force recommendation that Grade 13 French be made an admission requirement to U of T has been "overwhelmingly negative" by the departments of the Faculty of Arts and Science according to faculty dean Arthur Kruger.

The recommendation was one of the findings the Task Force on Canadian Studies and the University of Toronto presented to the Academic Affairs Committee of the Governing Council in September. Committee Chairman Michael Bliss then suggested that U of T Provost Donald Chant collect the responses of the various departments to the recommendations made about the faculty and report the results to the committee on January 11, 1978.

Kruger claimed the recommendation for Grade 13 French was raised by the Task Force on academic grounds rather than political grounds. He said he shared the view expressed by most departments that the proposal was a "hobby horse".

"The university shouldn't skew its admission policy to any political objective, no matter how widely it is held," he said.

Kruger said the responses he has received to date indicate "the various departments are looking at it (the Task Force recommendations) more as to how it will affect their particular activities."

All the departments were restricting their attention to recommendations that specifically affected them in terms of funding, he explained. Consequently, he said, he received no sentiment on the recommendation for the institution of a "Director of Canadian Studies" who would co-ordinate programs, research and publication and act as a "liaison to public groups and government."

Kruger said the departments felt it would be more appropriate for the dean of the Faculty of Arts and Sciences to deal with a "matter of overall university policy." He said he will submit an "administrative response" to this particular recommendation.

Reaction to the recommendation that the university promote "in any way possible, a greater relevance of work in Canadian studies to the multi-ethnic community" was lukewarm as well according to Kruger.

"I must tell you frankly that I don't understand what they (Task Force members) really mean. What the heck does it mean? Window dressing?"

Marvi Bradshaw of the Office of the Vice-President — Internal Affairs, whose report on the relations between U of T and the ethnic communities of Toronto released last summer prompted the recommendation, defended the suggestion.

"It depends on how you interpret it," she said. "The recommendation doesn't call for the creation of specific courses; instead, I would help the departments in the faculty make the university more responsive to the needs of the ethnic communities," she stated.

Vic's new scene

By CAROLYN CLINK

The development of Toronto as a cosmopolitan centre has flooded Victoria College with "box lunch students," said Vic English professor Northrop Frye to a large audience at the Vic's New Academic Building Thursday evening. Frye's lecture dealt with the role of Vic in the development of Canadian Culture. It was the last in a series of four special Sesquicentennial lectures dealing with Victoria College.

Looking back at his own past at Vic, Frye pointed out two of the major changes that have taken place among Vic's students and in their curriculum. He discussed the evolution of the commuter student. These students are a result of the growth of Toronto, he said. They have no sense of belonging, and therefore miss out on an important part of university life according to Frye.

He also spoke about the recent phenomena of Canadian Literature courses. In 1933 there were no modern literature "Canlit" courses, he said, but now they are "coming out our ears," at the expense of classical courses. The professors were expected to be writers as well as teachers. The idea of a writer-in-residence — "please, God, we never will have one" — is repugnant to Frye.

"I should like to see the undergraduate courses restructured," Frye stated. When questioned about this remark, Frye said he did not know of any plans at this time for course changes but commented that "there is nowhere to go but up."

A clown in this year's Santa Claus parade took a hike, drawing laughter along the way, from Bloor and Dovercourt passing Varsity stadium to Union station and finally ending up at the new, jaded Eaton's Centre.

IDENTITY CRISIS

As the university changes, the student changes; the role of one has always been intimately connected with the other.

It's important that the student position be articulated, not for any reasons of lobbying to obtain concessions from a seemingly autocratic government, but in order to maintain personal sanity. When the government legislates the ground out from under your feet, you had better be prepared for some dizziness.

First item for consideration must be whether the university can continue to be seen as a factory for job applicants. Professional faculties aside, the undergraduate students, who make up the bulk of the university population, are undergoing indirect preparation. When they are finished employers often consider them worthwhile for training in the specifics of the job.

This is not how most of the professional faculties portray themselves to students. There are, more frequently, traces of the ideals of the original academy, where the subject has value in its own right, and undergraduate study has its end, naturally enough, graduate school.

Most students harbor no illusions either with respect to job prospects or the focus of a degree program. But jobs are a small part of the total picture. What about the first-year student looking for a half-way house between high-school and employment? And has the university itself actually perpetrated a fraud, advertising jobs for degrees?

The university has a number of functions quite disparate from those it fulfills to justify government support. A university always claims to be a humanistic place, espousing the virtues of learning and reason. The university, therefore, can be seen at cross-purposes. It provides a service that justifies government assistance; it works, as well, in its own (altruistic, in prosperous times) interests. But when called upon to defend itself, these interests, needless to say, become more political. When necessary, reality pre-empt idealism.

Like any organization, corporation or being, the university when asked to justify its existence cannot be expected to remain silent. When an empire shrinks, troubles ensue as a direct result of economics. So don't expect any objective contribution from them.

But the students, at least of the current crop, have a vested interest in keeping the university alternative to the job market available.

The times, they are a changin'. Don't they always; isn't one of the great attributes of time that it facilitates change and gives us a perspective from which to view it?

The university will change; it does. If the status of "student" has anything at all to do with your identity, then that too will change.

Forget the questions of the purpose of such discussions in terms of achievable ends. What this means to you and me is in terms of why we are here, if your presence at the university ever had any meaning.

Watch closely: for one who commits him or herself to a program of study, the changes that take place will be metaphysical. If U of T changes, so does your degree, and so do you change, according to your commitment to it.

Of course, the underlying premise of this discussion is that the only free will that a student has is in the decisions to attend, and what program to enter. You can't tell GM to produce electric cars if they don't want to.

Letters & Opinions

Lang's Metropolis

In reply to the letter of Martin Heaviesides in your Nov. 11, '77 issue: he is wrong when he says that every time we play Fritz Lang's METROPOLIS we call it the film that influenced Hitler. We call it the film that inspired Hitler (it laid out for him the steps to power). Other people use the word "influenced". We do not. Nor do we always use that description. As far as the truth of the claim I refer him to FROM CALIGARI TO HITLER by Siegfried Kraacuer.

The film of METROPOLIS is based on an experience of Lang and his wife, Thea Von Harbou upon seeing the New York skyline for the first time in 1924; the book, by Thea Von Harbou, was published in the same year. It was very popular and it is highly probable that Hitler read it. The situation in the film is that of an Industrialist who uses a robot in the image of the woman who is the spiritual mentor of the working class to gain control over the masses. He then sends them on the path to destruction. The man who owned produced the film was Alfred Von Hugenberg who also through his control of most of the country's newspapers dominated a great deal of public opinion. On February 1, 1933, Hugenberg, once the most powerful man in the country and the only serious threat to Hitler's power was dismissed and Walther Darre took his position. Darre was a NDSAP leader. Hugenberg died shortly after.

Lang's films captured and glorified the great heroic legends of the German people. Today they still retain their visual power. When Goebbels asked Lang to make the Nazi films in 1933, immediately after Hitler came to power, he expressed to Lang how much both he and the Fuehrer appreciated Lang's work. In view of that statement and the fact that so much of the film that Goebbels was to produce had the look of Fritz Lang films I think it safe to say that Hitler had more than a passing fancy for the film.

Fritz Lang was a German Jew and the Nazis told him that this would not matter. However, Lang left for France the same night he had the conversation with Goebbels. Thea von Harbou of "Aryan" stock divorced him and remained behind. Nothing more was heard from her.

Kurt Gerron, another German Jew, (he appeared in the Blue Angel) made a film for the Nazis in which he showed a special village built for his people and the beautiful treatment they received from the state. After the production of the film, Gerron and all the Jewish people associated with its making were liquidated.

Also as regards Ivan the Terrible: Eisenstein was asked to reshoot the second part of the film because it affirmed the power of the individual opposed to the collective. He shot the last 20 minutes in color adding emphasis to his statement, then had prints shipped out of Russia before he could be stopped. He died before he could finish the third part but it was going to be an extension of his Marxist philosophy into the Marxist anarchy of a self-governing individual outside and above the state.

Eisenstein, who was Jewish and openly homosexual, frequently got into terrible scraps with the bureaucrats and for a long period was restricted from making films, which was criminal. There is no doubt in the minds of every source excluding a handful that METROPOLIS is among the fifty great films and high on the list. Mr. Heavieside's feeling that because Hitler liked the film is somehow a slur on the film is irrelevant. If Mr.

Heaviesides would research the facts a bit more he might wind up rearranging a few of his opinions.

Reg. Hartt

Newsreel demo

The showing of The Nazi Newsreels of Dr. Goebbels and the subsequent demonstration that took place in front of Innis College the night of November 8 have given rise to misconceptions that should be cleared up.

What was being protested by those who signed the petition and picketed the films was not the content of the films but their promotion. I have no objection to the showing of Nazi propaganda films on campus as long as the promotion for the films does not give the impression that the promoters approve of the content. In the case of Nazi Newsreels I felt, along with several others, that the promotion material left this in doubt. As it turned out Reg Hartt, manager of Regus Films — the organization that screened the films — agreed with this.

That the demonstrators were protesting against the promotion of the films and not the content is borne out by the absence of similar demonstrations in the case of other Nazi films. To my knowledge none of the groups or individuals who took part in the Innis picket have ever protested the showing of Leni Reifenshtal's Triumph of the Will. Yet Triumph of the Will is just as much a Nazi propaganda film as any of the films in the Nazi Newsreels series. The promotion for the former however has never been ambiguous.

Some people have claimed that the protestors accused Regus Films of being fascist. It was not possible for me to attend the demonstration from beginning to end, but during the time I was there I did not hear anyone accuse Reg Hartt or Regus Films of being fascist.

As anyone who has talked to Reg Hartt can ascertain he is not a fascist. Any misconceptions about this will only serve to discredit the protest.

We the people are disappointed in the content of many of the letters appearing in your paper. We feel you are sidelining the real student movement and working against the basic interests of the people.

In protest we have formed an organization which seeks to protect the basic interests of the people against the oppression of everything.

We support the struggle of the people, for the people, against the people.

We oppose the perpetuation of the peoples' struggle against the people's oppression of the people.

We support the basic interests of the people in their struggle to defend themselves against state-organized organizations.

We support the republic of Bolivia, the only remaining non-revisionist state, and we supported that exalted leader of the masses, the leader of all Bolivians, comrade Liby Doe.

Support the struggle.
Struggle against support.

U of T cutbacks are killing us

It was with a sense of real concern that I learned from an article featured in a recent issue of Varsity that the University of Toronto is contemplating cutbacks in the Psychiatric Health Service. Given the size of the student body, there will always be a number of students who will have problems requiring professional help. The University of Toronto, with its first-class counselling service, has hitherto stood out as a leader in people-oriented policy.

I can personally testify to the radical difference which the Service has made during my own full-time student days (I am currently continuing my education on a part-time basis). During my second year, owing to two bereavements which had the effect of activating personal stress, I found myself in urgent need of professional counselling. I could not have managed to continue attending the University without the skilled therapy given by Dr. Peter Mingie at the Psychiatric Health Service.

I am concerned to think that if cutbacks occur, students in difficulty will have nowhere to turn, because the reduced facilities will not be able to accommodate them. In times when the University is seeking to encourage enrolment, a situation where numbers of students will have to withdraw because they are unable to cope with both stress and their studies is not likely to be constructive.

I hope that consideration will be given to the importance to the University of the Psychiatric Health Service and that cutbacks will not in fact be made. Should reduction in the service occur, I believe it could only be to the detriment of the University, and that it would cause hardship to students.

Debate on Women's movement continues

I left Kate Millet's ambiguous and contradictory address with serious doubts about the cogency and wisdom of her position. Lisa Volkov's letter of Nov. 7 has failed to alter my understanding of Millet's talk; nor, for that matter, has it shown Janet Smith's analysis to be invalid. But more important than Miss Volkov's failure to refute the points made by Miss Smith is the fact that she has missed, or avoided, the major issues and questions raised by Miss Smith.

The first question that arises is this: Is K. Millet a leader of the women's movement? Miss Smith seemed to be asking this question, rather than asserting that K. Millet was such a leader. The word 'if' is quite small, but nonetheless, it is very important. Miss Smith had said, "If Kate Millet is a leader of the women's movement, it is indeed in crisis." She later stated that Millet's insinuations against men and the family tended to support long-standing suspicions that the women's movement is anti-men and anti-family. She then added, "Is it also anti-women?" The value of Miss Smith's intelligent letter lies in her questioning the unquestioned assumptions that lay in the foundations of Millet's thought, and possibly even in the foundations of the women's movement itself.

characterization which, Millet denies with her lips, but actualizes in her performances. "Women do not need to be told what to do," Millet told these women. There is an old political saying: if it waddles like a duck, quacks like a duck and acts like a duck, then for all practical purposes, it is a duck. As long as K. Millet continues to manipulate the media to teach her 'values' to others, we can scarcely lend credence to her denial of leadership.

It is also obvious that the women's movement could not wholeheartedly embrace K. Millet's views. They are hardly popularly acceptable views, nor are they even 'avant-garde'. Alas, they appear to be only an aberrant reaction. This leads us to Janet Smith's main questions. What is the women's movement? Who is it for? Which women does it claim to represent? What are its major concerns and issues? Although rape is a major issue for the women's movement, it can hardly be a defining issue. As Miss Smith points out, all decent men and women are against this most heinous crime. L. Volkov appears to answer the question of issues with the following list: "ERA, daycare, equal pay, etc." There is something curious about this list. Since the list was taken from Miss Smith's letter, we realize that 'etc.' in this case includes abortion. But is it obvious that abortion is in the best interests of women? Miss Volkov's silence on abortion merely accentuates the problem at hand.

Are the issues that are of deep concern to all women clear and obvious? Has anyone yet answered the question, "What is best for women?" For that matter, has anyone really bothered to even consider the question? Miss Smith suggests, and I agree, that anyone who attacks the family as such cannot have asked this question. Nor can they have the best interests of women in mind.

Goodbye to guy

The untimely death of Guy Lombardo is an unparalleled blow to the cause of Canadian culture. New Year's without Guy will be intolerable; we cannot relinquish control of this important cultural occasion to some snotty-nosed American! And we need not. I have a plan.

Lombardo was never what you might call energetic in his stage show. To describe his stage persona as riveting would be a mistake — riveted would be a better description. This is where my plan comes in.

First, we carefully embalm Lombardo's body. Then, come New Year's eve, we rivet it to the Waldorf-Astoria stage and reveal to the media that his death was really a hoax. Next, we run an electrical cord up his trousers' leg to his fingers, in order to achieve that essential snapping motion — the circuitry found in a rock-em sock-em robot ought to be sufficient. After that, we carefully arrange a paper hat upon his head and voila! — the show goes on just like it did the year before and the year before that and the year before that, etc.

I guarantee that no one will know the difference, — hell, even his band won't notice any change. And most importantly, Canada will not relinquish its control of at least one aspect of American culture. We'll show them what Canadian quality really means!

Remember: Guy Lombardo was the closest thing to Elvis Presley Canada had. We cannot let him die! Donations to this worthwhile project may be sent to the Varsity office.

Clearly, it is the media and women's organizations (see Globe and Mail, Nov. 2, 1977) which characterize K. Millet as a representative leader of the women's movement. This is a

Who pays for it?

On reading the varfeature of November 9, I am impelled to ask one question. Who will pay for the centre? Campus centre certainly sounds like a good project but where will the money come from to build it and to keep it on its feet?

We students complain that there are not enough summer jobs. We cry foul when the government starts to cut back on student loans.

If we students are finding it difficult to make ends meet, if we are finding it difficult to pay for our educations, how in the world can we expect to pay for a campus centre?

Changes demanded or else

In a strongly worded declaration to the Ministry of Colleges and Universities the Confederation of Ontario Staff Associations (COUSA) has stated its intention to "launch, with as many other organizations as we can likewise convince, an all-out campaign to elect a government which will bring some redress and sanity to the labor scene."

This was one of the current COUSA concerns presented to Minister of Colleges and Universities Harry Parrott by University of Toronto Staff Association (UTSA) representatives last month. The document, according to COUSA president Bill Groom, was given an "abrasive reception" by Parrott.

COUSA attacks federal and provincial government policy on energy, housing and government costs. The organization condemns the government for its failure to "redress the balance" by holding down essential costs.

Presenting statistics in what it calls "a child's primer in economics," the brief notes that the "huge increases" in this area should result in greater allocation of funds for COUSA to help cope with inflation.

The statement on controls was reached at a COUSA conference in Sudbury last August together with Bill Guest, case officer for the Anti-Inflation Board. Groom said the Toronto meeting with Parrott on October 26 effected "no change" in the government's policy on controls.

Another area of concern the document outlined lay in staff training and professional development. The brief notes that developments since 1976 have been "localized and limited." Quoting York University president Ian McDonald, COUSA advocates the use of "adaptive education" as a means of enabling people to "change directions at various stages in their career."

COUSA also recognized that Labor Minister John Munro "heartily endorsed the objective of paid educational leave." Parrott, however, refused to endorse the concept for staff members when approached in 1976 according to the report. COUSA urged Parrott not only to support the principle but to provide adequate facilities. According to Groom, Parrott this time agreed "in principle" but said that he "cannot direct executive heads as to how the money is spent."

Parrott was also sympathetic to the idea of support staff representation on the Ontario Council on University Affairs (OCUA), said Groom, but indicated there would be no vacancies because of re-appointments.

COUSA, which has been pushing for representation for two years, states in its report that a vacancy in 1978 "should be very carefully considered as a timely opportunity for the government to recognize the only interested still without a voice." COUSA furthermore says it would interpret rejection as "a lack of desire to co-operate further." Groom said in an interview, however, that all members retiring this year "will probably be re-appointed."

Groom recognized in a preface to the brief that COUSA was raising "some complex issues" and asked for a longer meeting with Parrott so the organization could "go back to our members with some real answers this time."

Groom, however, said after the meeting with Parrott in Toronto that "I don't think we won that bout."

John R. Evans: Doctor, President,... Prim

By Heather Hill

The world vision of U of T president John Evans is that of a harmonious universe, all the disparate elements working co-operatively in a finely modulated clockwork compendium of the stuff that life is made of—something like the miraculous operation of the human body itself.

"Balance"

In an interview with Dr. John R. Evans, U of T's ninth and most visible president, the word "balance" emerges frequently. The various problems besetting the university at this juncture could be so easily resolved, he says, if only people would recognize the need for phone call from Montreal and abruptly terminated by another scheduled meeting) was granted this newspaper for Evans to "squeeze the universe and roll it into a ball." His performance, however, was less spectacular than it was with Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau at 24 Sussex Drive last November.

His ability then to "marshall gathered opinion" resulted, according to one Maclean's columnist, in his inclusion in the Liberal Party's most successful political ploy since Trudeaumania—the Task Force on National Unity. His answers to the rifts that have developed in his own sphere are somewhat more indefinite and far less "dazzling".

strongest university in Canada. He cites the "outstanding" programs U of T offers and echoes the Planning and Priorities Committee's "Interim Report" in stating that external examination will support the university's present status. He also suggests, in conjunction with the report, that greater academic emphasis will be placed on the "quality" of programs, an area in which U of T is undoubtedly the leader.

The students the university attracts also play a great role in U of T's reputation for being Canada's finest. "We continue to attract outstanding students from across Canada and from other countries," Evans said. He pointed lastly to the university's research record: the grants, the fellowships and the

"Mindless Competition"

Students can also adopt this word as their talisman in the marks jungle according to Evans. The struggle for top grades has become so fierce that, as one law student put it, notebooks left unattended are ripe for the stealing. Evans too admits that entry into the professional faculties has led to "a mindless competition for marks". He suggests that other criteria be

Students are not the fat cats Trudeau termed them on the U of T campus last spring, Evans said. "There may have been a period when they thought the world was their oyster, but the students I meet are working very hard, not just for their academic work but they are trying to look after themselves economically too."

To the suggestion that these students may also be the victims of a university that decrees they need special awards of distinction attest to the "high quality university here."

U of T Research

The suspicions in certain quarters that the university is becoming "commercial" in its approach to research were dismissed by Evans.

"I don't think the word 'commercial' fits," he said. He admitted that there has always been a tension between "fundamental research" — work requiring a long time period and of dubious value to society — and "mission oriented" research — programs designed to come up with a specific answer to a specific problem, whether economic, medical or geological. The government will fund esoterica where practicality will result, while many in the university community have simply been interested in "pushing back the frontiers of knowledge."

The solution is one of a "proper balance," according to Evans. "In the past the balance has been a little to the neglect of (fundamental research). I think it would also be dangerous if the university went a little too far in... devoting all its resources to it. But I think there is a proper balance, I think the university is probably pretty close to that balance at the present time."

While Evans offered several examples of "missionary field" projects the university is currently engaged in, he allowed that government pressure pointed to practical research. Yet even the federal government was becoming aware of the need for "balance," he said.

"There is a bit of a sobering, even in those agencies, about ensuring a proper framework... of the basic and fundamental research that goes on in the different disciplines in the university. I'm more optimistic that there is understanding of that balance now than there was two years ago... I think if anything there is some recognition of the need for the balance now."

adopted for selecting the candidates — "leadership in other areas."

"With that type of balance I think you get a more constructive competition between students. In the health professions, the ability to interact with people, some sense of compassion, some sense of rapport, are... every bit as important as intellectual ability."

more stringent academic programs, Evans replied that what was needed was, again, a greater balance.

(He was referring to the concept of a "New New Program", to possibly replace the New Program of 1970 which in turn replaced the "Old Program" under which U of T had been educating its students.)

'The balance has been to the neglect of fundamental research.'

that balance to be achieved.

And at the same time, a sense of optimism emerges: U of T is doing well, and will continue to be number one, since not only has there been a competent physician to help heal ills, but external recognition has put the seal of approval on the university and its future.

The Canadian media's current pet sandwiched an interview with The Varsity into a schedule that has become increasingly crowded in the last few months because of the advent of the academic year, the celebrations of the University's 150th birthday and his out-of-town jaunts with the Canadian Task Force on National Unity.

A bare hour (interrupted by a

The galloping rate of inflation and the government cutbacks in educational funds now strangling not only U of T but all Ontario universities are not a new problem for the university, Evans said. He explained that the decision to restrict growth was made by U of T in 1972; consequently the university has had three or four years over the other Ontario post-secondary institutions to adjust to a "no-growth situation".

"For four of the five years since 1972," he said, "we've been in the business of reducing our effective purchasing power in the university."

He maintains that despite "a lot of problems" U of T is still the

'We continue to attract outstanding from across Canada and from other very media he is now courting and at the same time an expendable tool of Trudeau.

A political analyst working outside of the goldfish bowl that is the University of Toronto has rated Evans' chances of making it in politics as those of a "snowflake in hell". John Evans may have a large following at U of T, he said, but there are numerous people across the country with great support and, moreover, a university is light years away from the political arena.

Evans' well-reasoned, Renaissance style, detrimental in a theatre where cut-throat criticism has often proved fatal, hasn't deterred him from learning French. Together with his wife he spent six weeks at Laval University in Quebec brushing up on Canada's second official language.

Linguistics are not John Evans' strong point. (He displays a greater penchant for illustrating his arguments with medical analogies.) Three years ago he sent a letter in Italian to the editors of two Toronto Italian-language newspapers in regard to the alleged anti-Italian assessment on the part of a U of T

Ottawa, Evans said "in halting French" that he wasn't very fluent when co-chairman Jean-Luc Pepin was asked if he (Pepin) were the only bilingual member of the group.

To questions posed in French during this interview Evans handled himself better. He said that in the course of his U of T activities he spoke in French about two or three times a week at various conferences and meetings. His work with the World Health Organization would occasionally require statements or speeches in French but the language is most useful, it would appear, in the Task Force hearings and missions.

"It's important to talk with the people and understand their viewpoint on an informal basis," he said. "I don't speak well but now it's easier to have a sense of the words — translations are always different."

Evans agreed that unemployment in Canada is a "terribly serious problem" but maintained that the confederation crisis overshadowed it. "The related economic problems are probably going to be made worse by the instability and uncertainty of the national unity problem," he said.

New New Program Defended

The golden mean in this case will lie in the freedom of choice offered the students on the one hand and the lack of structure that results when students don't know what it is they want to do. Evans defended the New Program as early as last November in a letter published in The Globe and Mail following criticism in that newspaper of the inflated grades that were reported to be rampant at Scarborough College. For Evans, the "details" of the program aren't as important as the principles that lie behind it.

Evans said that the lack of structure — which permitted students to take "bird courses" for three or four years and finish wiser but not any economically happier — was rectified by the modifications of the Burline Report (which most students have never heard of but which showed them "a patterned relatedness of subject areas"). The lack of discipline on the part of other students "not as strongly motivated" has no immediate solution, it appeared, but the rigidity of the old program, according to this extremely well-disciplined man, doesn't justify having "the new programs swing all the way across the pendulum to their former lack of choice and opportunity."

"I think there's some balance. We've identified some of the deficiencies and efforts have been made to tighten them up."

Prime Minister Evans?

John Evans has been touted in some quarters as the possible successor to Pierre Trudeau; at the very least, it would appear, he will be running as the Liberal candidate in the Rosedale riding in the next federal elections. Evans has gained prominence by his presence in the unity Task Force, but he also won a certain amount of media coverage through his staging of last month's "Options Canada" conference on this campus. And yet Evans may find he is a victim himself of the faculty member. The letter, one editor commented, was so poorly translated that to publish it verbatim "would be taking advantage of him."

'Insulated ivory towers become ivory mausoleums.'

In July, at the first press conference of the Task Force in

Evans and "Options"

Evans also defended the legitimacy of the "Options Canada" conference, a three-day extravaganza that produced "long, learned papers" in plenty but very few solutions to the crisis according to one Toronto columnist. Evans believed that ensuring that the papers were presented and criticized was an end in itself. Another important function of the conference, he said, was the assembly of people from different parts of the country to discuss the papers and to continue the discussion of these issues with the perspective of all of Canada. "Conferences," said Evans, "are communications devices for the exchange of information."

If information was cheap at the conference, the monetary value of Evans' extra-curricular activities remained unclear. He skirted the question of federal reimbursement for his Task Force activities, but did say that accepting the position has created a "dilemma".

"Serving on the task force was a question I reviewed with the chairman of the Governing Council (Marnie Paikin). I did indicate I felt it was important but the university's society, government and business.

In a 1973 address, Evans told the Canadian Club that the central mission of the university lay in "basic research and scholarship." In an interview with The Financial Post last October he said: "Ivory towers that are insulated from change become ivory mausoleums." He saw the university as an "increasingly important partner ... of business, government and the public."

Evans maintained that "fundamental" research and scholarship is still the university's primary goal. "Being a national resource (as outlined for the university in the Interim Report) doesn't mean one is doing totally mission-oriented research," said Evans. "One still needs a sub-structure of basic research in the primary disciplines."

Considering the ruthlessness of economic evolution and the government's tendency to run roughshod over bodies in its path,

"The university ... a national resource."

responsibilities had to be carried as well. It's been most difficult during the months when the intensive travel program was on — visiting the different areas of the country."

When asked about his post-presidential plans, Evans has in the past demurred at the suggestion of politics. He has mentioned returning to medicine; to The Varsity he replied: "That's one of the areas that's been neglected."

But as the university approaches the end of its Sesquicentennial birthday party, and John Evans nears the end of his six-year term as president of Canada's most prestigious university, the institution itself seems to be on the verge of a new era. Government funding cutbacks, dropping enrolment, U of T's repeated pronouncements about its "high quality" programs would all seem to lead to the necessity to redefine the role of the university and of the University of Toronto vis-a-vis

Evans' successor will need more than a sense of "balance" to see him through his term of office at this university.

Varsity paper caper

By ANDREW MAHON

Don't throw away those old issues of The Varsity, they could be valuable.

An organization called "Is Five" has been re-cycling old Varsitys for about two months.

"The Student's Administrative Council (SAC) drops off about 1,000 pounds of leftover Varsitys every week," said Is Five official Frank Kegan. "They're worth about .6 cents a pound."

That puts the estimated re-cycle value of a single Varsity at three one-hundredths of a cent.

Is Five (the name is derived in part from an e.e. cummings poem, "Although many assume that two plus two is four, there are others who are interested in finding a more exciting solution, i.e. 'is five'.") is a non-profit research and educational foundation, located on Dupont Street.

"We re-cycle all kinds of paper," explained Kegan, "including office paper, brochures and recently 14,000 calendars."

Is Five's program received a setback recently, when a federal grant for their fine paper re-cycling proposal was turned down.

Although Is Five only re-cycles the leftover Varsitys that SAC delivers, Kegan expressed interest in setting up an expanded re-cycling system for newspapers.

"At some point we would like to see a system to deal with newspapers like returnable Coke bottles — when you pick up a new one, you drop off an old one." However, Kegan admitted that a program of that sort would take "considerable co-operation on everyone's part."

According to Kegan, part of the problem with recycling newspapers comes from the media itself.

"There's a feeling that newspapers have to be sensational and therefore readily disposable, but if the paper were something more regular it would encourage a conservator-oriented society."

Kegan said newspaper readers must realize that when they pick up their copies, they are receiving not just stories, but a physical quantity of paper.

Once the old Varsitys are collected by Is Five, the newspaper is fed into machinery that grinds it to its basic fibre. Then a number of fire-retarding chemicals are added to make the cellulose fibre safe for use as home insulation. (If Varsity isn't keeping you informed, it may be keeping you warm.)

"Once you realize the significance of the whole package you're buying, it's easier to realize the entire resource," claims Kegan. "One must be aware of this viable alternative to the media image and high consumptive economy which we have now."

Is Five recycles leftover Varsitys. They propose a system to deal with newspaper waste — "when you pick up a new one, you drop off an old one," like Coke bottles.

Roving reporter presents the bustling side of Paris

By KATHRYN DEAN

Today The Varsity debuts its "Roving Reporter" column. In this corner, the dispatches of previous Varsity reporters who have moved to other parts of the world will from time to time be appearing. This contribution is from a Varg hack now teaching English to school children in Paris.

A fish salesman, standing ankle-deep in gutter water, brandishes a dead crustacean in the faces of passers-by. "Madame, de bons poissons," he sing-songs to the morning market crowds.

To his left the lettuce and carrot man joyfully insults his clients and throws vegetables into their satchels. Across the street in front of a clothes shop dresses trail from sidewalk racks along the pavement.

A truck snorts its way through the crowds spewing exhaust fumes over meat, grapes and tomatoes. It's 10 o'clock and Saturday morning and Paris is bursting with flowers, dirt, dogs and shouting vendors.

Paris is always popping out at the seams. Little old ladies cram dogs, celery stalks, baguettes and onions into wicker boxes and mesh bags.

Their purses bark in subway trains and fall open to reveal distressed poodles.

Housewives imprison geraniums and begonias in tiny window-boxes. Gardens of shrubs and trees poke from roof tops.

Paris is old and crowded. Plants, animals and people are stuffed into all available nooks and crannies. Though Parisians try to contain nature, something always seems to give. Dogs turn up in alleyways and on cafe floors. In a restaurant on the Rue de Rivoli a relatively sanitary cat sits beside the table hoping for a morsel from the diners' plate.

People cram themselves into trucks that resemble overgrown Volkswagens. A Metro official helps push arms, legs and briefcases into a packed subway train so the automatic doors can close. Apartment buildings grow lines of laundry and cafe chairs and tables inch their way onto the sidewalk.

The limits instinctively respected in North America are non-existent or worn down by time in Paris. In rush hour five million Parisians redistribute themselves through the maze of narrow streets and sidewalks. Drivers jump curbs and park directly on the sidewalk. By 5:30 p.m. the boulevards around the Seine are a swirling mass of pedestrians and cars.

Paris is like a castle overlooking a garbage dump. Tree-lined boulevards are filled with ripped posters and dog merds. Side street boutiques sell fox pelts together with garish orange boas and dusty plastic flowers with bunches of fresh irises. A gypsy beggar-woman lies on the Metro floor mumbling deliriously and clinking a handful of coins. Women in delicate shoes pick their way through gutters and cobblestones.

Away from the boulevards and large parks life is the small spaces can be intense. Boys drag race on mopeds through narrow walled streets. A little girl rides her bike around a tiny "green space" dodging pigeons, winos and an artist at work. And in a corner of the St.

Lazare subway station, a Borodin string quartet can be heard over the roar of trains, footsteps and muffled tunnel noises.

Rabin stands firm

By DAVID ROSENBAUM

An independent Palestinian state on the west bank of the Jordan River is inadmissible to Israelis, said former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin last Thursday.

Speaking to about 500 people at a dinner sponsored by State of Israel Bonds in honor of Ben Dunkelman, one of Rabin's planning officers in the 1948 Israeli War of Independence, the former prime minister stated that such an "Arafat independent state" would serve as a "time bomb" disrupting any agreement between Israel and her Arab neighbors.

Israel will never negotiate with the "so-called PLO" (Palestine Liberation Organization), he stated. Wherever they have established themselves, he added, they have destroyed everything.

Rabin was also critical of U.S. President Jimmy Carter's Middle East diplomacy. He said that by calling for Israel's return to the pre-1967 borders and the establishment of a "Palestinian entity," the United States was taking positions contrary to Security Council resolutions 242 and 338, which had previously been accepted as the framework for negotiations.

He further criticized the Americans for bringing the Russians back into the peace-making process and for setting a deadline of the end of 1977 for the resumption of the Geneva peace conference. These measures were creating expectations that unless fulfilled, could bring about serious consequences, he claimed.

In a press conference held earlier the same day, Rabin defended

Israel's increasingly good relations with South Africa. He said that as much as he abhorred the policy of apartheid, the best way to encourage international understanding was through discussion, regardless of a country's domestic policies.

Rabin pointed out that Israel had maintained relations with the USSR up to 1967 despite that country's persecution of its Jewish inhabitants. Asked about Israel's sales of military equipment to South Africa in contravention of a United Nations embargo, Rabin refused to comment.

Rabin stressed that Israel was strong and would remain strong because "one must be strong to stay alive," and "no one will negotiate with a weak Israel." He expressed gratitude to American Presidents, "especially Nixon and Ford" for their supplying of military equipment to Israel. He noted the growing concern for Israel shown by Jews around the world and thanked them for their financial aid. Such help "gives us great confidence that we are not alone" said Rabin.

Badminton Fourth in Western Division

By GLYNIS PETERS

After a slow start the women's badminton team came into their own at Brock University this weekend to finish fourth in the Western Ontario Competition. Ahead of them, and winners of the finals last year, was Western with 41 points, followed by McMaster - 39, Queen's - 27 and then Toronto with 24.

In the singles department, top ranked Jennifer Rodgers won 4 out of her 5 matches, ending up second in her division. Carol Gombita duplicated this record exactly to also place second in her division. Completing the rundown of the day's victories were Kathy Kono, Sharon Beatty and Bev Schurr with 2 out of 5 games each, and Rhona Macdonald with 3 out of 6 as her final record.

The six members of the team earn positions according to their play. Their position at Toronto decides who they will compete against from other universities. Jennifer Rodgers, for example, as the number one player faced the best from the opposing teams.

In doubles, Rodgers teamed with Kono and Gombita with Beatty, both to win 3 out of 5 of their respective matches. Schurr and Macdonald notched up one victory out of their 5 games.

The team has an invitational tournament coming up at Ryerson, December 2 & 3, before moving on to the Eastern Ontario competition that precedes the finals.

Volleyball Team Smites Gryphons

By GLYNIS PETERS

A flat tire at the Benson Building prior to leaving for Guelph for the season's opener seemed ominous for the Women's Volleyball team, and losing their first two games on arrival furthered this streak of bad luck. Superstition was tossed to the winds, however, when after an inspiring talk from Coach Julie Andruchiw the team came back to take their next three games.

Guelph's first two victories were definitely decisive, with a first score of 15-3. The Gryphons are a strong, fast and very hard-hitting team, usually tough competition for the Blues. Toronto made an impressive comeback to win their games with scores of 18-16, 17-15 and 15-10.

The team this year is composed of six returning veterans and six rookies. In the rookie division however, are two experienced imports. Coming to Toronto from Queen's is setter Jean Evernden and from Wilfred Laurier, hitter Mary Rafferty, who are attending the Faculty of Education this year. These excellent players are contributing to what may prove to be a dynamic team this year.

Blues Lose Opener

By JEAN GRAY

The University of Toronto Women's Basketball Team descended upon the city of Guelph Wednesday night, anxious to begin their 1977-78 League Schedule. The Gryphons, however, sporting National team member Candy Clark and shooting stars Cindy Dean and Kathy Giacomelli, dashed any hopes the Lady Blues had of recording their first victory of the season.

The final score was Gryphons 67 and Blues 33. The Gryphons were kept in check throughout most of the first half by an impressively tight Toronto defence capable of demonstrating the disciplined positional play that will definitely take the team places this year. Barb Grochowski later remarked that there wasn't any one player responsible for containing Guelph in the first half, but rather it was a total team effort.

Cathy Heather anchored the Blues offence in the second half, along with Sharon Kosmochuk and Sandy Turney. On countless occasions however, the Gryphons thwarted the Blues drive with their highly aggressive press, forcing many Toronto errors in the backcourt, which the Gryphons were quick to capitalize on.

In short, Coach Bradley feels that the team is capable of making the minor adjustments needed to overcome teams the likes of Guelph, and anticipates Toronto being a stronger contender in the Ontario competition than ever before.

This weekend the team travels to Windsor ready to chalk up their first win of the season.

Countdown College Bowl

Over the last decade the College Bowl has grown to become the biggest college sport attraction of the year. In recognition of this fact, Metropolitan Toronto Chairman Paul Godfrey has proclaimed the week of November 13-20 "Canadian College Bowl Week".

The week will feature a number of events and activities to promote college football in Canada as well as raise money for the Canadian Save the Children Fund. The activities begin on Wednesday with a dinner at the Hotel Toronto. The theme of the dinner is "A Roast for Gross", the sports editor of the Toronto Sun.

On Thursday, Nathan Phillip Square is the sight for the 'kick for Canave.' Celebrities will try to raise money for Canave by place-kicking a football. The Toronto Junior Board of Trade will be donating one dollar for each yard kicked.

Thursday night the CIAU all-star teams and football award winners will be announced at a reception at the Hotel Toronto.

On Saturday, the countdown to the College Bowl continues with a parade from Queen's Park to Varsity Stadium. The Grand Finale will of course be the College Bowl Game at 1:00. This year's participants will be the University of Western Ontario Mustangs and the Acadia Axemen.

The Canadian College Bowl is a non-profit, charitable organization which was founded in 1965 to promote college football as well as raise money for Canave.

In 1965 and 66 the College Bowls were invitational events featuring outstanding college teams as selected by a national panel. They played for the Vanier Cup, named after the late Governor General Georges Vanier. The University of Toronto Blues were the first recipient of the Vanier Cup which was presented by Vanier himself.

In 1967 the College Bowl format was altered so that a national playoff system was used so that the College Bowl winner could be called the Canadian Champion. The new alignment set up divisions in Eastern, Western and Central Canada which would play-off for the right to go to the College Bowl.

As well as promoting good football, the College Bowl Organizers have raised over $130,000 for the Canadian Save the Children Fund since the creation of the National Final.

Mustangs In Final

For the second year in a row the University of Western Ontario Mustangs have earned a berth in the College Bowl, to be played next Saturday at Varsity Stadium. The Mustangs advanced by virtue of a 24-22 victory over the University of Calgary Dinosaurs in a game played in London on Saturday.

It took a 32 yard fourth quarter field goal by Paul Ford to clinch the exciting see-saw battle. To that point the game had been marked by the battle between quarterbacks Jamie Bone of Western and Darrell Moir of Calgary. Sophomore Moir proved to be no match for the veteran Bone.

Bone led his team to two first quarter touchdowns. On the first he hit Tom Annett on a 67 yard bomb. He then came right back to hit Ross Tripp with a 38 yard pass and run play that moved the Mustangs into a 14-0 lead.

Moir had trouble mounting a consistent attack and was intercepted twice in the first quarter. The Dinosaurs however, managed to battle back and were trailing by only six points going into the fourth quarter. They managed to narrow the gap to three after Moir engineered another touchdown drive following Ford's field goal.

The Mustang's opponent next week will be the Acadia Axemen. The Axemen advanced by trouncing the Queen's Golden Gaels 35-22 Sunday in Halifax.

Teams Tie; Share Title

In an upset, the University of Western Ontario tied Waterloo 6-6 in the Ontario Universities rugby final played at Waterloo on Saturday. The tie means that the two teams will share the title.

Waterloo entered the contest with a perfect 8-0 won-lost record while Western had lost two games on the way to the playoffs. Dave Chess scored all six points for Western while Dave King accounted for all of Waterloo's points.

Caines and Jeans Sparkle In Blues' Win

By JIM O'LEARY

The Blues continued their domination of the OUAA with an impressive 10-2 victory over the Guelph Gryphons in a game played at Varsity Arena Friday night. The Blues dominated every aspect of the game, showing why they are early favorites to repeat as league champs.

The Gryphons were clearly outmatched and were never really in the game. The Blues outchecked, outshot, outpassed and outthrust the slower Guelph team.

Toronto's domination of the game can most clearly be seen in the second period when the Blues outshot Guelph 16-1 and outscored them 4-0. Even the one shot Guelph did get seemed to result more from the softheartedness of the scorer than from anything the Gryphons did on the ice. Toronto held a 40-16 edge over the game in shots.

The Guelph team had several large players but they did not use their size effectively and continually lost battles for the puck in the corners. Toronto also met little opposition when they parked a man in front of the Guelph net.

The Blues were paced by outstanding performances from Doug Caines and Alex Jeans who each picked up four points. Caines had two goals and two assists while Jeans had four assists. The Blues also got two goal performances from Rocci Pagnello, Rob Gemmel and Frank Davis.

The Blues opened the scoring on a power play goal by Davis. The goal was the culmination of a pretty passing play between Davis, Doug Herridge and Wayne Morrissey. Alex Jeans went to work setting up three goals to send Toronto into a 4-1 first period lead. He set up Gemmel, Caines and Pagnello. Caines' goal was a beauty as Jeans sent him on a breakaway after hitting the speedy centre in full flight crossing the Gryphon blueline.

Caines opened the second period with a shorthanded, unassisted goal that came after Caines outskated a Guelph defenceman to a loose puck.

Cary Farelli had a hand in the next two goals. On the first he made a good play carrying the puck the length of the ice, circling the Guelph net and putting a perfect pass on the stick of Gemmel who was cruising through the slot. Gemmel had no trouble putting the rubber past the Gryphon netminder.

On the second, Farelli showed why he has a reputation as a sniper when he hit the corner with a shot from the face-off circle. Joe Grant and Brad Tamblin picked up the assists.

Tamblin and Grant came right back to set up Dan D'Alvise to send the Blues to the dressing room with an 8-1 second period lead.

Pagnello and Davis rounded out the scoring when each of them picked up their second goal of the game.

Both the Guelph goals resulted from a Gryphon getting in behind the defence pair of Pagnello and Gemmel. Coach Tom Watt was willing to take at least part of the blame for this. Because he uses three defence pairings throughout the game, Watt figures they should have more energy and therefore be able to take a greater part in the offence. Unfortunately they will occasionally be caught out of position as happened against Guelph.

The Guelph goalie had a busy night. Here Frank Davis tries to get a shot away.

BOWLING GREEN BEATS BLUES

The Blues were unable to make a sweep of the weekend as they dropped a 4-1 decision to Bowling Green in a game played in Ohio on Saturday. According to Watt the determining factor was that Bowling Green outplayed the Blues on power plays.

"Our power play didn't play very well," said Watt. The usually potent Blues power play went 0 for 5 while the opposition connected on two of their five power play opportunities.

The Blues came out a little flat and didn't skate as well as they usually do. When this was coupled with the fact that Bowling Green had a very good team which was rested and ready; the outcome was discouraging for the Blues.

The Blues started slow and fell behind 2-0 after a poor first period. They controlled the second but were unable to capitalize on their scoring chances. The Blues did not get on the scoreboard until the opposition had rolled up a 4-0 lead.

Doug Caines got the Toronto goal with assists going to Rocci Pagnello and Dan Tsubouchi. The goal gave Caines a five point weekend.

On Tuesday, the Blues will try to avenge the only loss they have suffered to an OUAA team this year when they travel to the York campus to meet the Yeomen. Game time is 8:15 p.m. in the York Ice Palace.

Scar. Likes Interfac

By JIM O'LEARY

Scarborough College's Athletic Director, T. Pallandi, squelched rumours that Scarborough would leave the Interfaculty Football League and play in the Ontario College Football League (OCFL) next season. There were many who felt that Scarborough's victory against St. Mike's in the Mulock Cup final last Thursday would be the final game Scarborough would play in the Interfac League.

Pallandi says there is no way Scarborough will not be back in the Interfac League next season. "The players want to play at U of T. They are university students who like to become involved in student activities," said Pallandi in explaining why Scarborough will be back.

Pallandi admits that Scarborough has been approached about joining the OCFL. At present this league consists of teams from Sheridan, Seneca, Royal Military College and Erindale. The calibre of the league is somewhere between interfaculty football and the intercollegiate league of the major Ontario universities.

Last year, Erindale dropped out of the Interfaculty League and joined the OCFL after a season in which they made it to the B Division Mulock Cup final. Erindale's athletic director Robert Ryckman says he is not sure if Erindale will go back for a second year.

Ryckman feels it was a worthwhile experience but was disappointed that the team was not more competitive. They lost all six of their games to finish mired in last place.

"The players would like to play in a league where they have a chance of winning," says Ryckman in explaining Erindale's hesitancy in rejoining the OCFL.

Pallandi has also considered whether or not Scarborough would be competitive if they moved up a league. He points out that "Scarborough will lose some important members from this year's team which would make it difficult to be competitive in the other league. There is good enough competition in this league (interfaculty)."

The speculation that Scarborough would leave the Interfaculty League started after the Maroons dominated the A Division of the League this year. They went undefeated for the second year in a row, capturing their second Mulock Cup in the five year existence of the club.

Phily's Finest Bounces Blues.

By JIM O'LEARY

The 'Philadelphia Connection' playing for the Laurentian University Voyageurs, was too much for the U of T Basketball Blues to handle in a game played at the Benson Building Friday night. Philadelphia imports Charlie Wise, Bruce Burnett and Varick Cutler combined for 72 points to lead Laurentian to an 87-70 victory.

Toronto coach John McManus explained "they were just too good for us, especially those Americans. And we didn't play too good either."

Wise led the scoring parade with 32 points. "That Wise is very quick and can really shoot," said McManus.

According to McManus, Burnett "didn't even break into a sweat" on his way to a 24 point game. Cutler didn't score as much, only 16 points, but controlled the backboards.

While conceding that the Voyageurs played very well, McManus felt that the Blues did not play up to their potential. "We missed a lot of shots and our rebounding was disappointing," he claimed. "We didn't get enough scoring from our forwards but we can play better," the coach continued.

Guard, Doug Fox led the Blues' scorers with 18 points. Tim McGhie had 14 and Randy Cook 10 to round out Toronto's big guns.

The Blues' next game will be played in Waterloo against the Laurier Golden Hawks on Wednesday.

The Varsity — Andris Auzins

Randy Cook (55) goes high, while Tim McGhie (42) looks on.

Dirty tricks at Hogtown

By BLAIR HUNTER

At a staff meeting held Monday night, the New Hogtown Press decided not to take a public stand on a theft that occurred four years ago.

The story began in 1973 when a customer card file was stolen from the New Hogtown Press offices. At that time the offices of the clearing house for left-wing literature were located in the Students Administrative Council (SAC) building on Hart House Circle. The card file was the only item taken in the break-and-enter that occurred sometime between Saturday, September 24 and Monday, September 26 in 1973.

New Hogtown Press' connection with people who could have made the "enemies list" in Quebec make it a prime target for investigation by the national security police, said New Hogtown Press Secretary-Treasurer Russel Hann.

In a similar case, Conservative MP Frank Oberle (Prince George-Peace River) charged in the Globe and Mail on November 12th of this year that the theft of documents from James Lewis and Samuel Publishers (now James Lorimer and Company), a small Toronto publishing company, was committed by a civilian security planning and analysis branch of the RCMP set up in 1971 by then solicitor-general Jean-Pierre Goyer.

The apparent motive behind the alleged break-in at the Lorimer Company was to secure documents linking the publishing firm to jailed Quebec radical Charles Gagnon who had a manuscript for sale according to Oberle.

Hann said that at New Hogtown Press the issue is far from being solved. "Because of adverse publicity that could be brought to the New Hogtown Press," he said, "our group will probably decide not to go public like the Lorimer case."

According to a source within the New Hogtown Press, in 1973 prior to the break-in a rift developed between the New Hogtown Press and the Communist Party of Canada

—Marxists-Leninist (CPC-ML). The speculation among several individuals around the time of the break-in was that the theft was made to look like CPC-ML retaliation but was in fact the RCMP taking advantage of a division in the ranks of the Canadian left to gain more information about potential subversives.

Prime Minister Trudeau has stated in the past that the university campus is by no means off limits to the police or their agents. The period of the early sixties saw university anti-nuclear weapons groups come under surveillance and infiltration by the RCMP's Security and Intelligence Branch.

In 1974, U of T student Dave Galbraith was investigated by the Mounties. The RCMP made inquiries on campus about his personal and political background. Galbraith, a member of the Communist Party of Canada, at the time told The Varsity: "By the type of questions the RCMP asked . . . they must have done a lot of digging."

They were very well informed about SAC activities and policies. It is a clear indication the RCMP is doing a lot more investigation of the student movement than we know," he said.

A campus-wide referendum over the funding of a Trent University homophile association has sparked the biggest emotional battle that university has seen in years.

The Trent Student Union (TSU) will be holding the referendum, which asks students to condemn TSU funding for "politically and sexually-oriented" groups comprising non-student members, next Thursday and Friday. The Trent Homophile Association, said its president Sheila McGillivray, meets all three criteria.

In budget talks two weeks ago the student union executive voted to give the association $600. (Over 20 campus groups received grants.) Trent student Don McIsaac immediately began collecting signatures for a petition to hold a referendum. (Under the TSU constitution a petition from 10 per cent of the student body can initiate a referendum to amend student union executive decisions.)

Further complications have been created within the TSU itself. The executive, consisting of 13 people and a chairperson, is unable to issue a cheque for the $600 it agreed to give the Trent Homophile Association two weeks ago. TSU cheques must be co-signed by both TSU Chairperson Geoffrey Montreuil and Finance Commissioner Justin Chiu. Since the budget talks were concluded, Montreuil has consistently refused to sign the cheque for the association despite repeated orders from the TSU executive to do so. When the petition came in, Montreuil issued a stop-payment on the cheque.

Subsequently, Chiu has also refused to sign the cheque on the grounds that he is liable for legal damages.

Both Montreuil and Chiu were unavailable for comment. Trent student newspaper editor-in-chief Phil Hurcomb said he has "been trying to get hold of them for the last five days."

Since the petition began, McIsaac has been meeting with campus groups to defend his position, citing the three bases of the referendum.

In response to the signers of the petition, the Coalition for Freedom of Association has been formed. Consisting of students, faculty members, and members of the TSU and other campus groups, the Coalition is endeavoring to hold the two forums required under the TSU constitution prior to a referendum.

The debate has attracted national news teams to the university and has left talk of impeachment in its wake. Hurcomb said three official resignations have been received by the TSU and that other union members don't come to the meetings. He said he felt, however, that impeachment wouldn't be carried out.

McGillivray stated that the wording of the referendum is such that "it's being seen by the media as an Anita Bryant kind of smokescreen." She said the referendum would cut down on interaction between the association and the Trent community and endanger the funding for other campus politically or sexually oriented groups.

The association, formed last spring, offers counselling services to Trent students and takes referrals from local hospitals. Their activities last year included an information session with the prisoners of Warkworth Penitentiary (near Campbellford).

McGillivray said he felt that the referendum had small chances of succeeding, but questioned the existence of campus "politically and sexually oriented" groups if it did.

Sandford Fleming to get new tenants

By ANDREW MAHON

Space allocation was the key concern last night, as the Resources Subcommittee of the Governing Council made specific recommendations concerning the reconstruction of the Sandford Fleming Building.

At a three-hour meeting involving representatives from the Department of Physics, the Faculties of Applied Science and Engineering, Forestry and Landscape Architecture and the Department of Computer science, committee members listened to their concerns about the reconstruction of Sandford Fleming.

The committee weighed the feasibility of the three options presented as possible plans for space allocation in the new building. U of T vice-president Harry Eastman talked of "the familiar but depressing story about university funding" as he outlined each of the proposals for the committee.

Most speakers at the meeting were in favor of "option two" — consolidation of the U of T Computer Centre (UTCC) operating on campus and amalgamation of the faculties of Forestry and Landscape Architecture.

In addition, "option two" leaves the Engineering Library close to the Engineering buildings and provides a maximum saving on rented space. Speakers were generally not optimistic about the re-allocation of space after Sandford Fleming is reconstructed.

"Amid all this gloom, the Department of Computer Science hopes to be a beneficiary of the Sandford Fleming project," ventured Department Chairman Professor Hume as he commented the consolidation of UTCC operations.

Although option two was selected by most department representatives, it was still considered far from ideal because it calls for Student Record Services (SRS) and assorted computer hardware to take up residence in McLennan-Physical. "That would force a compression of the physics building to the point where it couldn't function," said Faculty of Arts and Science Dean Arthur Kruger.

After all the visiting speakers had voiced their opinions, "option two" was considered as a motion and passed by the committee with some consideration given to the space problems of the Physics department.

The subcommittee's recommendation will next be considered by the Planning and Resources Committee.

Ex Scar Student Pres Calls suit "a stunt"

By RICK BOGACZ

The legal suit for $400 being brought against the 1976-77 Scarborough College Student Council (SCSC) President Gary Sands by this year's council executive is a "publicity stunt", said Sands yesterday.

In an interview Sands explained that he does not want this incident hanging over his head as he pursues a political career. Although he gave no specific reason why SCSC would be seeking publicity, he felt the "enemies" he made on the council last year may have something to do with this affair.

Current SCSC President John Shalagan explained that the $400 is a fixed balance Sands still owes from his overdrawn salary of $832.42.

According to Sands the T-4 slip he filled out read that he owed the council only $350. On May 6 of this year he completed the payments for this amount and since then has not heard a word from the council concerning the remaining $400, he said.

Sands said he wanted a letter from the SCSC executive explaining the accounting error made on the T-4 slip. He also wishes to be formally informed of the remaining amount he still owes the council, he said.

However, Shalagan stated that Sands will not receive any such letter. He is convinced that Sands already knows how much is yet to be paid: "This year's student council executive has finally run out of patience and will be settling this matter in small claims court," he said.

Sands believes that Shalagan is "almost suing himself" because he co-signed the cheques that were overdrawn with Sands. He stated that this fact will be revealed when the cases are presented in court.

Sands claimed that the executive is "foolishly" omitting the $82.42 from the original $482.42 balance. (A small claims court will not preside over a case involving amounts over $400.) If he were given the information he desired in letter form, Sands said he would be willing to pay the amount indicated. "I do not want to be unfairly made out to look like an embezzler," he said.

Varsity Committee split, but SAC complaint upheld

By JOHN WILSON

At a stormy four-hour meeting of the Varsity Committee Monday afternoon, marred by insult and abuse, a formal complaint by the Students Administrative Council (SAC) regarding the front-page article "SAC a Corporate Baron — union" (Friday Nov. 11) was upheld 6-1. The Committee's decision was based on an eight-page brief prepared by Brian O'Riordan, SAC University Government Commissioner, which outlined the legal difficulties the article had created for forthcoming labor negotiations between SAC and its employees' union, CUPE 1222. A proposed two-page apology prepared by SAC as the basis for discussion was scuttled in favor of progressively milder forms of retraction.

The Varsity Committee, the body responsible for the paper's editorial integrity, is composed of four delegates from SAC, four from the ranks of Varsity staffers, and one member designated by each side's elected member. This composition was clearly shown as SAC and Varsity appointees split evenly on matters of principle and rules of order. (A tied vote, according to Roberts' Rules of Order, indicates that a motion cannot go forward.) The Committee's regular business was quickly dispensed with and the SAC brief discussed, including a proposed acerbic two-page apology. The Committee makes recommendations only, but its' recommendations are taken most seriously by both paper and publisher.

O'Riordan noted, in introducing his brief, that it was an unusual step (as other committee members later noted) but that it was undertaken only after "serious consideration". The article, if uncorrected, he said, was prejudicial to SAC's position in future bargaining and to the personal reputations of SAC President John Tuzyk, Carolyn Caldwell and himself.

He suggested that the article in question was improperly prepared and designed to deliberately affect the delicate negotiations underway. In particular, material taken from grievances was essentially of a private nature, no SAC representative could comment on pending grievances, and the use of hearsay evidence was personally damaging, he stated.

Leaks okay

Representatives of the Varsity pointed out that "leaks" are "a fact of journalism" and that there is no impropriety in publishing leaked information. SAC members further complained that as the nature of the article was not made clear to them in telephone conversations, their lack of comment had been obtained under false circumstances. They were disappointed that the union had, apparently, violated the confidentiality of the grievance procedure.

On an amendment of David Tennenhouse, SAC appointee to the Committee, the apology presented was reduced to its barest bones and all contentious material contained in it suppressed. On a recorded vote, the amended motion failed to pass, 4-4, with members divided according to their connection with the paper or SAC. A new motion containing the wording found on today's front page, was introduced by David Lloyd and passed 6-1.

There was no joy in Mudville as the exhausted Committee members filed out. Varsity staffers will likely find the article coming back to haunt them in staff meetings, and SAC officials are reportedly not satisfied with the eventual wording and are still considering legal action, in order to clear up their position vis-a-vis the union.

Varsity
staff meet
Friday 2pm

Another ponderous meeting of the Varsity staff is scheduled for this Friday at 2 p.m. The card will feature discussion on the following issues: Allocation of pages, National Union of Students (NUS) position, selection of winners of the all-expenses paid-trip to Halifax for the CUP 40 conference. The main bout on Friday's agenda is the discussion of the SAC fiasco perpetrated in Monday's issue. Layout proposals and the ORCUP meeting will also be dealt glancing blows. Be there at ringside. Bring your kid gloves. See you at 2 p.m.

These people aren't waiting for a revolution. Their attention is attracted to Eaton's Santa Claus parade last Friday. Our photo editor, Alex Sochaniwskyj, caught the intense gaze of onlookers catching some of the Christmas spirit early. Like most of us they'll be looking forward to holidays, parties and celebrating the true meaning of Christmas.

Blackout at Lash Miller Bldg result of water coming in roof

By PETER HOENADEL
on the scene

The lights went out at the Lash Miller Chemistry Building at approximately 2:45 p.m. yesterday. Research and undergraduate labs on the fifth and sixth floors in the east wing of the building were pitched into blackness by a short circuit created when water came into contact with the electrical system.

According to Bondrup Neilsen, Assistant to the Chairman of the Department of Chemistry, workmen were refitting a drain on the rear podium of the east wing when water escaped through the ruptured roof. Neilsen said that no serious problems resulted from the blackout. One undergraduate class was sent home when their chemistry experiments were deemed unsafe without full lighting and ventilation.

Neilsen had his own experiment interrupted by the power failure. Neilsen said that some precision instruments will have to be readjusted when power is resumed.

Further hazard from the power failure was averted by a secondary power system that ensured the continuation of exit lights and ventilation systems. Neilsen said this contingent measure was implemented at Lash Miller after the power failure that paralyzed Northeastern United States and Canada in 1965.

Cyril Davies, area supervisor for the Lash Miller Building, assured The Varsity that power would be restored by morning.

"Eat your words or die."

Overheard conversation.

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprise. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university.

The Varsity is managed by the Varsity Committee which is responsible for the management, financial policies, and editorial integrity of The Varsity.

An express function of the committee is to receive and consider complaints about the paper. Formal complaints — as opposed to letters to the editor — should be addressed to: The Chairman, Varsity Committee, 91 St. George St., Toronto, Ontario.

Independence, not Levesque

Canada is going through a "crisis of Confederation" today, according to news reports and various spokesmen. The press has covered every utterance of Trudeau, Levesque, Pepin, Robarts and all the other characters in this drama with banner headlines and front-page stories.

U of T in particular has been a forum for this debate. President John Evans is a prominent member of the Trudeau-appointed Task Force on National Unity. Parti Quebecois member Gerard Godin spoke on campus recently. The Options Canada and Alternatives Canada conferences were held here. Assorted "ad hoc" groups have formed at U of T to gather support for one side or the other and other groups have organized discussion meetings.

Varsity staff members have felt the necessity to take a stand on the issue. We realize that the question of "national unity" affects students directly, just as it affects all people in this country. More than one attempt has been made by politicians to enlist youth and students, in particular, to march for the cause of national unity. There have even been suggestions that we should support armed intervention in Quebec.

We reject this sort of plea outright. Whatever we think of separatism or Levesque, we oppose any plans to use military force to impose another government's will on the Quebec people. Other remarks have been less inflammatory but have also attempted to pit Canadians against Quebecois. These efforts cannot succeed as long as most people recognize Quebec's right to determine its own future.

The Quebecois have a long tradition of resisting domination — a cultural, social and political history that began long before Levesque left the Liberal fold to found the PQ.

French-speaking people settled in Canada a good two hundred years before the British conquest in 1760. And let's not forget it was a conquest, an open military victory and subsequent occupation. Rebellion against British rule and the fight for independence continued by many Quebecois. Numerous examples can be given from Canadian history, not all of them found in our grade school primers. One of the most notable examples is the uprising of 1837-38 in which pitched battles were fought.

Remember the Lord Durham report, which we were taught to revere as the document that recommended bringing Canada together? In 1839 Durham looked at the unstable situation in Quebec (then "Lower Canada") and at the different situation further south in Louisiana which had been swallowed up as a minority in a larger amalgamation. Durham wrote, "It is only by the same means — by a popular government, in which an English majority shall permanently predominate — that Lower Canada, if a remedy for its disorders be not long delayed, can be tranquilly found."

Here we have not only the overwhelming of Quebec given as a rationale for union but a case study of how suppression of a minority can be decked out in the garb of democracy. The next year the British parliament took Durham's advice and amalgamated Upper and Lower Canada in the Act of Union. The act joined the two areas on an equal basis — which meant, for example, the debts of the two were to be shared equally. Which is fine until you realize that Lower Canada's debt was about 95,000 pounds and Upper Canada's debt was over a million pounds. Confederation in 1867 further consolidated the political assimilation of Quebec into the larger Canadian majority.

Even today the Quebecois have the cultural, social, even psychological, traits of being a people. This is not something that can be decided by an opinion poll but reflects centuries of historical development. It is this aspiration of achieving economic and political independence that Rene Levesque exploits today. He didn't invent the problem nor has this "crisis" suddenly arisen because of a few tactical errors on the part of Liberal governments over the past decade.

With this in mind, let us look more closely at the alternative Levesque is offering.

The day has long passed when it could be said that Britain dominates any part of Canada, let alone Quebec. Since the late 1920's British influence has fallen drastically, while American investment and domination have been on the upswing. Even a Liberal paper like the Toronto Star has to admit our economy is dominated by the US. This kind of domination is also reflected in the stunting of our culture and indigenous social development. Independence thus is a joke if it means even greater reliance on the US. And that seems to be the direction Levesque wants to take Quebec.

One of the first things Levesque did after coming to power was run down to New York to woo the big money boys. Godin boasted at U of T that American funding would be the PQ's road to "independence". This is in fact no independence at all. To throw off the formalities of a British rule which is no longer a threat, just in order to embrace the very real domination by the US is to perpetuate the current situation.

Our conclusion therefore is that Quebec has the right to decide its own future but the promise held out to it by Levesque is a false one.

Letters & Opinions

Book replacement

"Into the library the students come and go asking where did all the books go? This farcical piece of prose may become more valid if the University library system doesn't question its present policy of replacing lost or damaged books. I purposely omit the words 'stolen books' because one would hope that the elaborate detection system now in operation is adequate security after the expense it has cost the library.

It would probably be unjust (to a degree) to blame this scandalous policy of not replacing books solely upon the chief librarian. The source of this injustice might, more rightly, be placed with those masked bandits on financial committees governed from Simcoe Hall. It is very important for the process of any learning experience to take place that the resources be available for this to actualize. The most attainable resource for most students at university are books. The result of limiting books causes many avenues of learning to be cut off. The side effects of this move causes students to feel embittered because they know they are being cheated. The next side effect of such a policy leads to a development of its intent (i.e. limiting service to save money). This as we have seen recently has led to cutting down hours and library staff working hours. The next progression will be in cutting down all auxiliary services as college libraries which depend upon university support. If we follow this to its logical extreme students in the near future will have to go to municipal libraries because such services on campus will be considered a luxury and will be discontinued.

There will always be books damaged or lost due to malicious types, careless people, and from the natural decay of the book because of time. I want a proper education and believe the university by its very nature as a centre of learning is responsible for maintaining services that forward this activity. I believe a policy of not replacing books that have already been in existence and extending this policy's ideology into other aspects of the library service is not demonstrating the responsibility that a university has for maintaining a centre of learning.

Something should be done about this horrid policy. The Varsity should start a major editorial fight against this policy. Students should, at first, send letters to the Librarian's office to complain. It's about time that students of the seventies took a stand against this type of sell out.

Nazi Newreels

To:
David Reinboth
President, ICSS

Dear David,

The Graduate Students' Union at U of T is totally opposed to the presentation of the "Nazi Newreels" on campus in this inflammatory context. The advertising for these films blatantly supports the Nazi regime. That this can happen is a monumental insult to our society, to the victims of the Nazi regime and indeed, to the German people.

As a fellow student organization with similar goals, we find it impossible to believe that you condone the presentation of these films. We therefore urge you to do all that you can to prevent the further showing of this series. We will gladly give assistance to you in any way possible that would facilitate these efforts.

The Executive Committee
Graduate Students' Union

More Opinions

Harry Parrott, what are you doing?

Post-Secondary education demands not only significant intellectual achievement but also substantial financial resources. The key to an adequate student aid scheme is whether it provides financial assistance to those who would otherwise be unable to afford the education their academic achievement merits.

Limitation on number of years.

Provincial grant assistant will be restricted to a maximum of eight "grant eligibility periods". This is aimed at cutting off graduate students and most professional students from grants, and at restricting college and undergraduate student participation.

A "grant eligibility period" is NOT simply a term where a student is registered full-time and receiving assistance. The period is any term, or part of a term, when a student attended college or university part-time or full-time, whether or not the student applied for or received any assistance. This means:

- a) if a student took a part-time college or university credit course five years ago, 2 grant eligibility periods have been used up.
- b) if a student registers for a part-time or full-time course of study, and decides to withdraw (after the first day of class, for example), an eligibility period has been used up.
- c) if a student fails a year, 2 eligibility periods have been used up.
- d) if a student's program is longer than 38 weeks, 3 eligibility periods have been used up, despite the fact that it is only one academic year.

In summary, the limit on the grant limitation will restrict access to post-secondary education in the following ways:

1. It will make admission to graduate school and most professional programs much more difficult.

Currently these students are classified as independent of their parents because they have four years of post-secondary education, and are not subject to the arbitrary parental contribution table. This is the reason many graduate and professional students are receiving aid under OSAP. Under the new plan, this criterion (four years of post-secondary) will make them ineligible for any grants.

2. It will penalize students who take part-time courses before starting full-time studies.

3. It will penalize students in preliminary or preparatory years for example those who go to community colleges before entering university.

4. It will penalize students who change programs in the midst of their course of study. In these times of high unemployment this may mean forcing students away from gearing their education to changes in the labour market.

Independent status.

Under the new program, single students will be assessed as dependent on their parents unless they have spent three full years in the work force. No reason for this new regulation has been given. Under OSAP a student who has spent two full years in the work force or successfully completed four full years of post-secondary education or a combination of three years of school and one year in the work force is assessed as independent.

With the current unemployment rate, students could be well into their thirties before they have completed three twelve-month periods in the work force. The new independence criterion means that many mature working adults will be assessed as though they were still dependent on their parents even though there is no likelihood of their parents actually contributing to their education. The age of majority in this province is eighteen for every purpose except student aid.

Summer savings requirements.

The Ministry guidelines for summer savings are extremely ambiguous. While the new guidelines propose to base the student's expected contribution on "actual earnings", we are informed that a "minimum contribution" will be expected. This is not an improvement over the present OSAP regulations. This has been acknowledged even by the Ministry, as unrealistic in the context of the crisis in summer employment for students.

Flexibility through loans?

As the new aid picture now stands, 20 per cent of students currently receiving some grants will be disqualified by the new eligibility limits. In addition the new "stricter criteria" for grants will cut off many more. For these students, the new plan provides for student loans under the Canada Student Loans Plan. At present, the maximum loan under this plan is $1,800. This amount is obviously insufficient to cover the cost of educating oneself for a year. (Especially since many professional degrees have tuition fees ranging up to $1,000). Yet, if the ceiling is removed, students will be faced with an appalling amount of indebtedness on completion of their degrees. Clearly, the "flexibility" of the new system offers little solace to students in financial need.

Responsibility not censorship

In writing a qualifying supplement to Kim Ian Michasiw's article "Film Mythology and Civil Liberties" in the Friday, Nov. 11 Varsity, I would like to identify myself as one who has participated in both protests referred to but who is as adamantly opposed to censorship as the writer of the piece.

The interpretation of the meaning of the demonstrations that the writer is engaged in is itself a myth — a product of media distortion and political co-optation of a movement with very different intentions than the promotion of censorship. The Women Against Violence Against Women who protested Snuff are demanding the closing of this specific film (and no other) as a gesture of both symbolic and specific significance. Symbolically our protest was a demand that the issue of the trend of violence against women promoted in popular media and culture as sado-masochism and the depiction of women as victims for the purpose of titillation (and ultimately social control) be brought to public attention. Our effort to 'stop the film' at the grass roots level was the voice of a buried public awareness.

In terms of the specific film we believe that any movie which actually or allegedly (in its advertising) sells itself on the basis of the fact that a human being was actually murdered in the making of it must be prohibited. This is not a censorship of artistic expression (facsimiles are 'acceptable' in terms of that specific objection) but the prohibition of murder.

In the eyes of many the Hate Literature issues also arose. According to the law that which incites hate towards an identifiable group in society is prohibited. Women are not included among groups that are protected, a significant omission worth exploring.

Appealing for City Hall intervention in the matter of banning the film was a mistake recognized by virtually every one in the coalition. The result of that move was an attempt on their part to incorporate and co-opt us into the Yonge St. Clean Up and censorship campaign, both of which we adamantly oppose.

With regard to the Nazi Newsreels; not all of us were asking for an outright ban of showings. What we recognize is that Regus Films in its various guises as Cinema Archives (Palmerston Library) and Aladdin Cinema (on Yonge Street) is responsible for conspicuously frequent and repeated showings of a particular array of films including Triumph of the Will, Metropolis (a labour-management reconciliation film which "inspired Hitler" according to the hype) and Birth of a Nation, a film which among other things glorifies the Klu Klux Klan. In light of this their intentions are suspect. While not drawing any definitive conclusions we are nevertheless challenging them with two demands; that their sensationalist, build-up advertising be altered, and that the films themselves be shown in a responsible, educational context — an explanatory lecture, a disclaimer film showing the other side of the Nazi atrocities. This addition will make the difference in terms of a critical presentation of the film which will be responsible in terms of how it appears and the attitudes which it engenders.

It is this writer's belief that artists, recognizing the power of their art, must take political responsibility for what they produce and how it is presented. This moral imperative should not be enforced by law, but it is my hope that it will be observed voluntarily. Repeated showing of propaganda films without contextually defining measures being applied does bring about the familiarity to which Michasiw refers — the sort that risks making fascism more innocuous, even appealing as horror and stylistic still turns into 'camp', then possibility in the public consciousness subjected to repeated uncritical exposure.

One last dimension which must be recognized with respect to 'freedom of the arts' applies to the Snuff films at least — that what we are fighting is a commercial industry of mass production — a business which operates for profit through the exploitation of both consumer and object. This is different from creative artistic expression-statement. To many the distinction in Capitalist society may be a hazy one (which is why the issue of 'censorship' can be raised against us), but that is no reason not to raise the question through direct challenge.

In view of this situation it must still be granted that the protest response was somewhat confused and certainly misunderstood. Nevertheless, it is important to recognize that when one is dealing with amorphous, contradictory, many-layered many-implicated phenomena as described it is difficult to always be clear and focused in one's strategy. Learning through practice is one of the ways people explore, discover and understand the parameters of what they are attacking. As conscientious individuals we must not allow the dangerous trend in public consciousness that the one film definitely, the other possibly, represents, pass unnoticed and unchallenged.

Lisa Volkov

Heavisides responds to one and all

In reply to Mr. Hartt; there is a slight difference between the word "influenced" and the word "inspired". The latter is the stronger of the two terms, and so the implication of your ad is even more sensationalistic than I suggested.

Further, I am aware of most of the background material on Metropolis which you included in your informative letter, and I would be the last to argue that Hitler had not been impressed with the film, even inspired by it. The point I wanted to make was that your ads included that remark in boldface in large type over the film's title in every recent promotion. Except for the title, nothing was more prominent in the ads than the slogan "The film that inspired Hitler". That I thought and continue to think to be sensationalistic advertising, because it still does not strike me as the most important single thing about a film that almost no one doubts is "among the fifty great films and high on the list".

As for the difficulties Eisenstein had in dealing with the Russians towards the end of his career, I am aware of these as well, and regard them as marks in his favor. But is there any evidence that the censorship problems he had were in any way related to any attempt to expose the vicious (and incidentally utterly un-Marxist) character of the regime he lived under and served with his films? If you can give me evidence that any clear statement by Eisenstein on film about the Gulags, about the purges, about the real horrors of the Stalinist regime was censored by the authorities, then I will withdraw my remarks concerning Eisenstein, and cheerfully I have no wish to think ill of anyone if I can avoid it and yet remain in my own view honest and true to my convictions.

In reply to Mario concerning the demonstration over the showing of the Nazi newsreels. Firstly, if the protest was really over the way the films were promoted, I continue to question whether the promotion of the Nazi Newsreels was any more ambiguous than the promotion recently of Triumph of the Will and Metropolis. Secondly, while it may be true that no one at the demonstration accused Reg Hartt or Regus Films of being fascist, it is not true that the protestors never made this accusation, since the petition-letter calling for the demonstration, which appeared in the Varsity and on various walls and telephone poles in poster form and was presumably fairly widely read amongst the student population, stated that Regus Films "claims it has no connection with the Western Guard." Now whoever wrote that letter may or may not represent the sentiments of the protestors at large, but the letter was endorsed by the protest, and the implication of the statement is clear; Regus Films is to be thought of as fascist until proven otherwise. Therefore, although I agree with Mario that any misconceptions about Mr. Hartt being a fascist "will only serve to discredit the protest." I do not accept his allegation that it is those who, like myself, opposed this slur on the part of the protestors who have discredited them. The remark linking Regus Films with the Western Guard is enough in itself to do that.

In reply to Herb Hartmann; I've said it before and I'll say it again, rape is a defining issue of the Women's Movement, and precisely because in his words, "all decent men and women are against this most heinous crime". Because in spite of this general opposition, it continues to be a crime which is ignored in the courts or, when dealt with, dealt with in such a way that a woman who places such a charge cannot leave the courtroom psychologically undamaged. And until that changes it is a defining issue of the Women's Movement, since the attitude of the courts towards rape is one of the prime indicators of the general social attitude of denigration towards women.

Cheers to All.

Pop professor finds social values in sitcoms

NO 319 JAN. 3

WHO—OR WHAT—IS THE MYSTERY MONSTER BATTING—

In this example of popular culture American super-hero shows his impotent rage when confronted by the might of oppressed people taking matters into their own hands.

By PETER HOHENADEL

What is the significance of popular culture? Professor Mark Freiman of University College offered his assessment at a Sesquicentennial Lecture sponsored by the School of Continuing Studies on Tuesday afternoon.

Freiman traced the development of culture through history, beginning with the elaborate and often obscure art forms produced by the private patronage system of antiquity. This economic relationship to art was overwhelmed by the industrial revolution and the rise of the middle class. At that time, Freiman said, mass reproduction reinforced the economic maxim of he who pays the piper calls the tune.

In this way, Freiman said, "art became a commodity that we buy and sell like shoes. The challenge became to attract the largest number of consumers." The transformation affects the integrity of art, in Freiman's view. Pop culture signifies a "movement away from absolute aesthetic standards to a relative commodity standard." In short, he said, art is debased.

Freiman went on to consider the implications of this debasement to modern pop culture. Using television and motion pictures to illustrate his thesis, Freiman examined the social responsibility of pop. Television sitcoms originally dealt with common domestic problems in which no serious threat to the status quo is introduced. Shows like Father Knows Best, The Danny Thomas Show, and the Dick Van Dyke Show always ended in happiness and resolution, he said.

The new wave sitcoms, beginning with All In The Family, attempt to deal with more complex social issues. Freiman insisted that these shows may use social issues as vehicles for comedy but offer no solutions. "We know that Archie Bunker will never change," said Freiman.

The next stage of evolution was the Mary Hartman series. It was considered innovative in that it attempted "to distance the audience from the sitcom form," said Freiman. This distance is achieved by ridiculing the importance of personal problems behind most sitcoms. "Mary Hartman is constantly in a quandry over whether to wax her floors or solve her emotional problems," Freiman said.

Since such parody is inherently weak, Freiman said, TV viewers have come to accept Mary Hartman as any other soap opera. Freiman concluded that content is always sacrificed to form in popular culture.

If situation comedies show us a view of the everyday world, then science fiction and its cinematic counterparts present the way the world could be. Freiman used the films Star Trek and Star Wars to demonstrate his thesis. Freiman observed that these highly successful films also reinforced the status quo in that good always triumphs over evil. The power of "Good" is represented by "the Force" in Star Wars. Freiman linked this concept of a preternatural power to the adventures of Superman. "Only by resorting to a superhuman demi-god can we solve our problems," he said.

Freiman's analytic look at popular culture extended to the world of rock music. "Rock is a challenge to the status quo," he said. By means of a series of slides depicting rock sex symbols, Freiman showed how the rock culture helped to change social values about sexuality.

The final step in this evolution is punk. According to Freiman, the form of rock as dictated by the marketplace dominates its revolutionary sexual message. Consequently, punk rock has begun another revolution. The revolutionary aspect of punk confronts violence, and in Freiman's estimation, violence cannot be assimilated by the status quo. Punk represents the newest alternative to the artistic sterility of popular forms of culture, he said. Punk could lead to a further degradation of humanity and art, Freiman concluded.

OTTAWA (CUP) — Allegations and details of reported illegal RCMP security service activities are surfacing daily in the House of Commons, provoking opposition members to ask if Canada is becoming a police state.

Among the most recent allegations against the security service of the RCMP are:

- reports given by Solicitor-General Francis Fox that the RCMP have illegally opened mail since 1954.

- details that is common practice to examine the envelopes of hundreds of letters passing through the post office;

- facts disclosing the existence of "Operation 300" which is a code name for RCMP illegal break-ins, reported to have gone on for years and years;

- news reports that the RCMP have hundreds of informants in government departments telling the police of the activities of communists and suspected subversives;

- reports from the Quebec government's Keable Commission that the RCMP had planned to "plant" a letter stolen during the illegal raid and break-in at the Agence de press libre du Quebec on what they called a "well-known extremist" in an attempt to discredit him among leftist groups;

- evidence given at the Keable Commission hearing stating that after the barn was burnt in Quebec the Black Panthers met anyway with the FLQ at a farmhouse near Ottawa;

- allegations made by PC member Ged Baldwin that the RCMP may have infiltrated the Parti Quebecois;

- allegations that the RCMP may have farmed out some of their activities to private security firms in order to avoid its being traced back to being RCMP work;

- reports that the New Democratic Party, its federal members and officials may have been particular targets for RCMP surveillance;

- and reports from the Quebec Keable Commission indicating that it was standard practice for the security service to accept receipts with fraudulent signatures for services.

The government's sole response to the growing number of critics is that all such reports will be forwarded to the royal commission now looking into all aspects of RCMP wrongdoing. Opposition members say this amounts to a cover-up because the commission report won't be ready for years — certainly not until after the next election. Even with an interim report from the commission, they say action is necessary now to deal with the political accountability of the force.

Gallery Club: a change from residence food

By MIKE MOYLAN

Many U of T students may not be aware of one of the dining facilities available for them here on campus. The Gallery Club of Hart House is open to students for lunch and dinner from Monday to Friday. The club, located in the east end of the building on the second floor, consists of three licensed rooms. The main Gallery Dining Room seats up to 80 people; the Small Gallery Dining Room can be booked for smaller gatherings of up to a dozen people and the Common Room, a licensed lounge is open from noon until 2 p.m. and 5 to 8 p.m.

A fixed price lunch is served from noon to 2 p.m. in a buffet style with cold meats and a hot dish. Dinner, available from 6 until 8 p.m. offers a wide menu. A chef's "special" changes every day and prices vary. There is also an annotated wine list with a broad price range which includes a "Wine of the Month" as well.

Susan Wilson, chairman of the Gallery Club Committee, admits that while the club is doing fairly well for the lunches, not as many students are coming in for dinner. She said she feels that students are not aware of the facility and don't take advantage of the club.

She said that since the Gallery Club was once the exclusive U of T Faculty Club, it has an atmosphere that seems anti-student, "although this isn't the case."

Wilson also said she feels that most students don't realize the Common Room is part of their facilities. She pointed out that the Hart House Graduate Committee recommended that the name Common Room be renamed the Gallery Common Room in order to emphasize the availability of these facilities to all members of the House.

She mentions too that all full-time and part-time students are members of Hart House once they have paid their student activity fees. She added that the club is a student service operated for their benefit and that Hart House is not trying to make a profit on this venture: "They just want to break even."

Audrey Hozack, Assistant Warden (Administration) of the Gallery Club Committee, advises that the club holds a wine seminar for students every year to promote an appreciation of various wines. The club is also proposing an evening wine cafe once a week. Still in the formative stages, its success will depend on student response. Wilson explained that one of the concepts of the club is to provide students with "a guide to future dining and to expose them to the enrichment of dining out."

The Gallery Club offers students all the advantages of good dining, Wilson and Hozack insisted. There are no restrictions on dress and guests from outside the university can be brought at any time, says Wilson. They'll even arrange to provide cakes for birthdays or other special occasions provided sufficient advance notice is given, she said.

Evan's caper tracked Varg crack hack spells canine fact

By PETER HOHENADEL

The agonizing question of U of T President John Evans' political future has finally been resolved.

For months now, political pundits from Larry Zoff to Mario Cutajar have been attempting to plot the dashing prez on Canada's political map. Unsubstantiated rumors from inside sources have picked Evans as the next mayor of Flin Flon, Manitoba, and the most likely successor to Tom Cossit, official thorn in the side of the Prime Minister. None of these rumors have proved to be true.

Hard work and good luck finally paid off at The Varsity. In an exclusive interview with T. Rover Canine, personal valet to the president, The Varsity learned that Evans has decided to run for the leadership of the Party Quebecois at their next leadership convention. Canine said "Master John found a serious mood of discontent in the province of Quebec when he attended a French language course at Laval this summer."

Canine related that a small incident involving Evans proved to him the need for a new order in Quebec. Apparently Evans was ordering a meal in a Montreal restaurant when the waiter challenged him with misuse of the French language. Evans protested vigorously that the phrases "two oeufs" and "a glass of eau" were indeed proper French.

An indignant Evans took the next plane to Quebec City, home of the provincial legislature, said Canine. In what he described as a "stimulating but confusing gabfest," Evans' restaurant incident grew into a major leadership wrangle with leading members of the Parti Quebecois.

According to Canine, Evans left the Quebec legislature with an enthusiastic mandate from his newfound colleagues. Canine quoted Evans as saying, "I couldn't quite understand all they were saying, but I am certain that I left them in very high spirits. Indeed, some of them were moved to tears of elation. As I bid them arrivederci, some of the more emotional members buried their face in their hands. Their leader had arrived. They were delivered."

According to uninformed sources, Evans has already filed his nomination papers, even though he has not yet found someone to second his nomination. He is believed to be trying to persuade Maurice Duplessis to second his ticket. At press time, Duplessis was unavailable for comment.

Vic sleep service spells sure success

By ANDREW MAHON

Cinderella and The Sleeping Beauty may soon become the favorite reading material of fourth floor residents at Margaret Addison Hall, Victoria College.

Following the example set by tuck-in experts at Carleton University in Ottawa, a group of female residents have initiated a similar service here at U of T.

Tuck-in Pro Janine Orlando explained that the service started last Sunday night when the fourth floor females invited one of the Vic men's residences over to help with traditional bedtime chores. "There are eight houses in Burwash (Vic men's residence) — we invite one a week, and we return the favor."

The helpful males pop over to the girls' residence and partake in the customary bedtime rituals (Koolaid and Cookies), then the retiring romances sing songs, tell stories, tuck in the girls and provide a goodnight kiss.

Problems arose last night when some of the over-anxious bedtime boys crammed into an elevator which got stuck.

"Apart from that, it's really going well," observed Orlando, "it's a great way to meet people."

U of T Hockey Blues: 86 years

By Jeff Buckstein and Jim O'Leary

Very little interest has been taken in hockey by Varsity men until the present winter. During last term a good deal of talking was done on the subject but no steps were taken to form a club. The reception of a challenge from the McGill club has however enlivened the believers in hockey, and a meeting was held on Thursday evening last in Mr. P. Whyte's room in residence to form a club. The Varsity Hockey Club was the outcome of an enthusiastic gathering.

In the absence of skating facilities on the college grounds, the committee are endeavouring to secure the use of the city rinks.

—The Varsity, 1891

So began the career of the Varsity hockey club, known today as the "Blues." 86 years after it all began, the U of T annually boasts the top team in Canadian college hockey.

But getting there wasn't easy. Varsity's hockey team (originally called the "Beats") did not make a spectacular debut. Their first game ever was a 2-0 shutout defeat at the hands of Upper Canada College. Here's how The Varsity recorded that game:

"The paths of glory were not found passable by the Beats on Tuesday last, when they began their career on skates, and suffered defeat at the hands of the Upper Canada College Hockey team. This was the initial match of the season and a lamentable want of practice was manifest."

There is no record of the team's performance during the rest of the 1891 season but there appear to have been no games played against McGill.

In 1892, the U of T entered the Ontario Hockey Association (OHA) playing with Osgoode Hall and the Toronto Athletic Club. The January 26, 1892 edition of The Varsity reported that "a rink has been made adjoining the College Residence, and each afternoon a short practice is indulged in. The fee for membership in the Club is placed at $1."

A second team was organized that same year, which played its games against Trinity College, the Toronto Granite Club and the Victorias of Hamilton.

It wasn't until 1894-95 that Varsity won its first title in what amounted to the city championship, defeating both Osgoode Hall and the Toronto Athletic Club in regular season play.

Varsity's first recorded intercollegiate game was in February 1895 when Queens won 19-3 in a semi-final game. A Varsity reporter offered this objective, in-depth analysis:

"While Queens undoubtedly played superior hockey, the difference was not so great as the score might show. The rink was poorly lighted, and it was almost impossible to see the puck when lifted off the ice. In addition to this Bradley's skates were badly out of order, and the good playing of the forward line was greatly impeded.

Varsity made the OHA finals in 1898-99 only to be defeated, again by Queens.

In 1898, a skating rink was constructed on the north campus with a playing area 172 feet by 90 feet to be used by Varsity teams for scrimmages. The teams played their earliest games on curling club rinks in the university vicinity and at the covered Caledonian Club rink on Mutual Street. Around 1900 Varsity began to play its games at the Old Arena Gardens, the first artificial ice rink in Ontario. This was their home until 1926, when Varsity Arena was built.

Varsity's senior hockey club joined a newly created intercollegiate hockey union on November 19, 1902. Their opponents were Queen's and McGill. The first intercollegiate league game was held January 16, 1903 in Kingston where arch-rival Queens defeated Varsity 7-1. The Queens University seniors followed up by winning the amateur championship of North America.

The 1907-8 team won the Intercollegiate, City and Can-Am titles.

During the 1909-10 season the newly-formed Varsity Juniors began play in a Junior Intercollegiate Series.

By 1914-15, the Varsity Juniors were a force to be reckoned with,

In 1920-21, Varsity went through the regular season without a defeat to win the Intercollegiate Championship. In the OHA senior playoffs Varsity defeated McGill 11-0 and Brandon (Manitoba) 8-3 in a two-game total point series to capture the Allan Cup, emblematic of senior amateur hockey

Hockey Club presented the "Queen's Cup" for the winner of annual competition and — surprise! — Queens didn't win the first year; McGill did.

An intermediate group was established consisting of teams from the U of T, Queens, McMaster and Royal Military College and it was the intermediate team, or "Varsity Seconds" who won the first league championship for U of T. They won in 1905.

But finally, in 1907, the Seniors broke through to win the intercollegiate and city championships. The 1908 Varsity captained by a scrappy centre named Conn Smythe. Smythe led the Junior team to the OHA title in 1915 as Varsity defeated the Berlin "Union Jacks" in the final. (Berlin's name was changed to Kitchener in 1917). That was the final year for intercollegiate hockey until after World War One. For Maurice Malone of the Junior team it was his final year of hockey. He was killed in action June 1916.

The 1920's were a very successful decade for Varsity as they dominated the Senior Intercollegiate League and won the championship every season.

supremacy in Canada.

In 1923, Conn Smythe took over the reigns of the Senior team. His 1926 championship team, led by Joe Sullivan (now a senator) in goal, Ross Taylor and captain Jack Porter on defense and forwards Lou Hudson, Dave Trotter and Hugh Plaxton, graduated together almost to a man. But the team stuck together, and the "Varsity Grads" represented Canada at the 1928 winter Olympics held in St. Moritz, Switzerland.

In 1926, Varsity Arena was completed. The 4,800-seat arena on campus meant that the Varsity teams had unlimited time to practice. The senior club under Smythe responded with an undefeated championship season in 1926-27. Smythe left U of T at the end of the '20s to a career as owner of Toronto Maple Leafs. He was responsible for building Maple Leaf Gardens.

Varsity won the Senior Intercollegiate Championship in 1928 under the coaching of Lester (Mike) Pearson, but the team was defeated in its bid for the Allan Cup.

After the 1928 season, Pearson began a successful political career, which led him to become Minister of External Affairs, and later Prime Minister.

Varsity did not dominate the 1930s as they did the decade before. McGill was the dominant team during the Depression decade. Former Toronto Maple Leaf star Ace Bailey, sidelined from active hockey in 1933 after an attack by Boston Bruins' Eddie Shore was named head coach of Varsity Blues (as the senior team began to be called) in 1935. He held his coaching duties until 1948.

During the '30s, the hockey club attracted crowds of about three thousand, according to Howie Ringham, now assistant manager of Varsity arena. Ringham joined the arena staff in 1932 and was Varsity's head trainer for twenty-seven years following World War Two. He said the crowds were quite enthusiastic about the hockey Blues in those days. "They had a great number of students out to the games, but there was a better general public crowd."

In 1937, the Blues travelled to Minneapolis to play the University of Minnesota, then on to New York to play McGill, the University of Montreal, Princeton and Yale.

In 1938, Blues went on a pre-season trip to Spokane, Washington to play Gonzaga University and the New Westminster "Cats" before heading to Los Angeles to play two games with Loyola College.

"It was quite a thing for Californians to see hockey in those days," said Ringham. But it was exciting for the hockey players to see Hollywood, too. Upon their return to Toronto, players told a Varsity reporter that they "played to capacity crowds in California on all occasions." Even more interesting was that they "played out of doors in Southern California. There was a freezing system built underneath the ice surface," said Ringham.

In the final season before World War Two temporarily halted league play, Varsity won the 1939-40 senior and junior championship (there was no intermediate team in the '30s and the juniors were affectionately called "Baby Blues").

The 1939-40 senior team's victory against McGill was hailed by The Varsity:

"A flying, fighting band of Bailey's Blues made the biggest news of the Varsity sports year at the Forum here Friday night when they trimmed the McGill Redmen 5-1. This is the first time the blue and white keyholes have ruled the roost since 1932."

The "Baby Blues" were led to their championship by Stafford Smythe, who like his father Conn, eventually became an owner of the Toronto Maple Leafs. In the final game against McMaster Smythe scored the insurance goal in a 4-1 victory.

A 1940 Varsity noted that "Staff Smythe, playing his usual neat, elusive game, scored the prettiest goal of the contest, at the same time making the Hamilton defense look silly. Grabbing the disk at centre, he went in cagely, got around Leal, slipped the puck between Boyd's legs, regained it in front, drew out Martin and backhanded it into the open net."

During the 1930s the International Intercollegiate Ice Hockey League was established with Canadian teams from the U of T, McGill, Montreal and Queens playing American teams from Harvard, Princeton, Yale and Dartmouth. Due to lack of experience, the American teams usually ended up losing by large scores.

If there is one word which would sum up the U of T's hockey program since after the war, it would have to be excellence. Toronto's hockey program has been blessed with excellent teams, coaches, players and a superb record.

This era spans the final years of Ace Bailey's coaching career, the remarkable play of stalwarts such as Dave Stephens, Steve and Hank Monteith, Paul Laurent, Gary Innes, Kent Runke and countless others. These years also witnessed a remarkable growth in university hockey as well as the U of T's indoctrination into European hockey. Many of the Europeans faced by the Blues went on to become household words in Canadian homes after the NHL and WHA ventured into European hockey.

The post war era got started when Ace Bailey iced a team for the 1944-

45 season. This was the first Toronto team to hit the ice since the outbreak of war.

The team played in a hastily organized league consisting of teams from the Navy, Victory Aircraft and Watson's AC. They all played out of Varsity Arena in six Friday night doubleheaders. Toronto posted a respectable record of three wins and three losses.

The next season the league became better organized and was made up of teams from Toronto, McGill, Laval and Queen's. Toronto played six league games and 14 exhibition games that season, travelling as far away as Colorado called Stephens the "most outstanding player to every wear the Blue and White." Today Stephens is practising medicine in east Toronto.

The hockey of the 1950's was a lot more physical than it is today, according to a number of people who have seen both eras. Tom Watt, coach of the Blues since 1965 and a player on the 58-59 championship team, says he "laughs now when people say hockey is becoming more violent." In those days fighting was allowed (rule changes since have made it an automatic game suspension for fighting) and it was not uncommon for brawls to erupt.

Trainer Howie Ringham, who has teams were competing with the learning from Europeans long before studying Czechoslovakian and Russian styles of play came in vogue.

Watt had his first taste of European hockey when his Blues dropped a game to the Czech national team, 7-3, in 1966. The Czechs had international stars such as Valclav Nedomansky, Yuri Holicech and Dzurilla. What impressed Watt the most was that "they wouldn't let us have the puck, we'd shoot it in and chase it but they wouldn't let us have it."

Watt was so impressed with their puck control that he has since adopted many aspects of the European style of game.

The Watt years have been characterized by good teams, great individuals and championships. The most talented team of all was probably the 1966-67 squad which won a national championship with a record of 14 wins, one loss and one tie. This team was led by players such as Paul Laurent ("the best all round player" to play for Watt), Steve Monteith (the highest scorer in the history of intercollegiate hockey), Hank Monteith (high scorer and player for Detroit Red Wings) and Ward Passi (perennial all-star).

Through Watt's years the Blues have won and occasionally lost a number of big games. Some of the most thrilling which come to mind are:

- the 1966 loss to the Czech national team.
- a 1-0 overtime loss to Loyola in the 1968 national final.
- a third place finish at the 1968 International Federation of Student's Union games in Europe in which Toronto's only loss was to Czechoslovakia and in which they tied Russia 5-5 in an exciting game.
- a 1-0 overtime loss to Cornell in which Ken Dryden sparked and the winning goal was scored after only seven seconds of overtime.
- a 5-1 win at Varsity Arena over the Soviet national team featuring upcoming international stars.
- a 3-2 national championship victory at Varsity Arena in 1973 which was the first time Toronto won the national title at home and was the fifth national title in a row for the Blues.

over Concordia in which skeptics claimed Toronto did not deserve to be in the national final (they were admitted as the host team despite the fact they were eliminated in the OUAA playoffs) and in which Concordia was rated number one in the country despite the fact that Toronto had beaten them in their only two meetings of the season.

The boom in university hockey coupled with the expansion of professional hockey resulted in the universities being looked upon as a source for potential NHL and WHA players. It is not unusual therefore player is good enough to go on to a pro career that's great, but our program was developed to play at a high level of competition while continuing their education," he says.

Watt speaks proudly of the academic record of some of his past players, especially of the careers of six members of the 1968-69 championship team. From this team, Steve Monteith, Gord Cunningham and Ward Passi all graduated with law degrees while Bob McClelland (PhD Chemistry), Jimmy Miles (Dentistry) and Brian Thompson (Orthodontist) also moved on to professional careers from the Blues.

The record speaks for itself. Since 1945 the Blues have taken 18 Queen's Cups and won a remarkable nine out of fifteen of the national championships that have been played. For the future, the outlook is optimistic for college hockey. The decreasing number of jobs in the professional market is causing more good juniors to turn to university as an alternative. The influx of junior players such as this year's crop of Joe Grant, Dave Jenner, Cary Farelli and Brad Tamblin will only help maintain the strong hockey tradition which has been developed at the U of T.

Bringing home the Allan Cup: a "Tally-ho" on Bay St. in 1921.

for exhibition contests. The team was led by captain Wally Halder who won the scoring championship.

Hockey in the late forties and through the fifties was characterized by intense rivalries and rough play. In 1946-47 the Queen's - Toronto rivalry was particularly acure. That season Queen's was in last place but had a chance to deprive Toronto of the championship if they could beat them in the final league game. Throughout the season the encounters between these two teams had been very rough which caused much anticipation for this last contest.

One account before the game states that "if Queen's never wins another game it must upset the Blues. Through fair means or foul the Blues must not win; the Queen's Cup cannot rest in Toronto." True to their word, Queen's went out and beat Toronto forcing Toronto into a playoff with McGill. In this game goalie Dick Ball "made saves no fantastic that the crowd was left in inarticulate awe," to lead Toronto to a 4-0 victory and the first Queen's Cup since 1940.

In the 1947-48 season Toronto won their last Queen's Cup for Ace Bailey, taking thirteen games in their 20 game season. This team set a new record for intercollegiate hockey by scoring 98 goals over the season.

Up until the late 40's the winner of the Queen's Cup met the winner of the American intercollegiate league to decide the International Intercollegiate Ice Hockey League championship. The series however, was cancelled after the American program failed to keep up with the Canadians.

In the 1950's the Blues iced a number of powerhouse squads. The 1950-51 championship team was probably as strong as any seen since. This team was led by the line of Rick Howson, Phil Arrowsmith, and Ernie Frey who placed 1, 2, 3 in league scoring.

The mid-fifties were dominated by Toronto teams. Under the coaching of Jack Kennedy, the Blues won five consecutive Queen's Cups from 1955-59, including an undefeated season in 54-54.

These teams were anchored by Dave "Red" Stephens who played both centre and defence in his remarkable eight years with the Blues. One press release of 1968 been involved with the team since 1932, echoes these sentiments. "The players back then were a lot more physical and tougher," he says.

The calibre of hockey in the 50's was probably a little bit better than it is today according to Watt. In the 50's there were more players out of junior hockey playing at the intercollegiate level. This was because the old six team NHL offered openings for only the very best juniors. Many players realizing they would not make it turned to university hockey which led to strong teams throughout these years.

The 1960's was a period of great university expansion and growth of university hockey. As universities sprang up throughout Ontario, the demand of these schools to become involved in intercollegiate sports led to the folding of the old four team league and the formation of separate leagues in Ontario and Quebec. The Queen's Cup was replaced as the symbol of intercollegiate hockey supremacy by the newly formed Canadian championship which were run by the Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union for the benefit of Universities across the nation.

Besides being very successful (nine national titles in 12 years) Tom Watt's years as coach are in many ways the most interesting. Watt's

- a 3-2 national final victory in which Paul Laurent, playing in his last game for Toronto scored the winning goal with seven seconds remaining in the game.
- a 6-3 national championship over St. Mary's in which the Blues came from behind 3-1 with only three and a half minutes left in the game.
- a 3-1 national championship victory against St. Mary's in which St. Mary's only goal was scored with one second left on the clock when Blues goalie Gary Innes was watching the clock instead of the play.
- the national championship victory to see that a number of players from the Blues as well as other universities went on to professional careers.

From the Blues: Hank Monteith (Detroit), Mike Boland (Toronto Toros), John Wright (Vancouver, St. Louis and Kansas), Gary Innes (Pittsburgh, Philadelphia and Indianapolis), Nelson DeBenedet (Pittsburgh, Detroit), Dave Tataryn (New York and Toronto Toros) Kent Runke (Boston and Winnipeg) have all gone on to professional careers.

Watt is quick to point out that the aim of the U of T is not to churn out professional hockey players. "If a

At 4 o'clock the Planning and Resources Committee of the Governing Council of the University of Toronto will meet in Simcoe Hall to decide the fate of the Campus As Campus Centre project. If the self-financing restriction on Phase I of the project is removed, we're underway. It sure seems to take more than a little while getting your point across sometimes (the idea for the project started in 1970), but improving the quality of life at the University is important enough a goal to call upon all your strength.

Your local SAC Rep and College Councilor has a copy of the petition SAC plans on presenting to the Committee. In it, SAC notes that the "no net cost restriction" is unprecedented on this campus and asks for its removal. This petition should be back to the SAC office no later than this Friday, November 18th.

SAC has also prepared a most informative pamphlet entitled CAMPUS AS CAMPUS CENTRE: LET'S MAKE IT HAPPEN, explaining the Campus As Campus Centre project as well as giving its history. This pamphlet can be picked up at all SAC locations or at general meeting places throughout the campus.

Signing the petition and reading the pamphlet are important, but don't forget to be at Simcoe Hall for the November 21st meeting of the Governing Council.

Make sure the Governing Council knows that you want Campus As Campus Centre to start now. Come on out!

Some things are worth the struggle no matter how long it takes.

ROAM AROUND DANCES: THRILL AND MOVEMENT

For two years now people have been happy to take SAC's invitation to Roam Around. Right from the start, the SAC sponsored Roam Around Dances were a smash success, and they have continued to be a solid campus favorite.

Coming Friday, December 9th, SAC is ready to set you dancing to the sounds of the Lisa Hartt Band at Dr. John's in the U.C. Refectory, the Lenny Solomon Band at New College, Wetmore Hall and the Great Rufus Road Machine at St. Mike's Pub. Advance tickets are only $2.00 and will entitle you to partake of all three out-of-sight amplifications.

The Lisa Hartt band is led by the very talented, and equally attractive Lisa Hartt, a popular favorite in Toronto — especially with university audiences. Lenny Solomon formerly recorded as part of the Myles and Lenny singing group and has cut his own unique rock and roll path with his violin. The Great Rufus Road Machine placed last year in the top ten of the Best Vocal Group category in the Radio Music Poll.

Beer at Roam Around is priced from 70¢ to 75¢. For your pleasure, a different D.J. will play recorded music between sets at all three pubs, so you never have to stop dancing.

The Roam Around was begun to foster an informal meeting of people from different sections of the University. SAC changes the locations of the Roam Arouns in response to requests from local student councils.

WOMEN'S DISCUSSIONS

An informal discussion on Sexuality: Attitudes and Values will be held today in the Hart House South Sitting Room from 4 to 6 p.m. The speaker will be Rhonda Katz.

An open Discussion on Women's Studies is planned for Thursday, November 24th from 5 to 7 p.m. in the same Hart House location. Kay Armatage, Co-ordinator of Introduction to Women's Studies (U of T) and Chaviva Hozek, Chairperson, Women's Studies Programme Committee (U of T) will both be in attendance.

THE STUDENT ADVOCATE

The National Union of Students' newspaper, The Student Advocate, is out now and ready to be picked up, free of charge, at any SAC location or Varsity delivery drop.

The U of T, represented by SAC, was one of forty-five campuses from all over Canada who attended the NUS Fall Conference on October 21st to 23rd. The coming issue of The Student Advocate will tell you all about the conference's developing of a national campaign to get governments to act on student problems.

Your first step in helping to develop the broad base of support for many of NUS and SAC's joint ventures is to pick up your free copy of The Student Advocate.

Jock trusses shun busses

By BRIGITTE MERTLING

U of T's new Athletic Complex is big news in Toronto these days. Although construction is presently only in the preliminary stages, a lot of people will stand up and take notice when the roof trusses are installed in February.

"It's going to be a beautiful, well-designed building," said Tony Van Loon, project director for Ellis-Don Contractors. Following the trend set by Roberts Library, the Complex will be an "exposed concrete structure," he said. Some of its features will include 12 squash courts, a 50 metre pool, and a field house containing a track and tennis and basketball courts.

Next February, the roof trusses will be put in place. Van Loon said he feels that "it will be one of the biggest things Toronto has ever seen. The trusses are each 180 feet long and 22 feet deep pieces of structured steel.

"They are the longest trusses ever used and will span the field house without support columns," he stated. Due to their length, the three 60-foot pieces of each truss will be brought to the site at night when vehicle traffic is light, each truss will be assembled in mid-air, he explained. "Once the roof goes on — then you'll see things happening," he quipped.

Van Loon finds the project interesting for its size and architectural features. He has 65 men working on the site but construction is still 10 weeks behind schedule because of a strike by electricians during the summer. According to William Lye, Director of the Physical Plant at U of T, it is "difficult to say just how far behind or ahead of schedule the project is." He added there would be a review of the building's progress next summer.

Construction will continue throughout the winter. Projected completion date of the building is January 1, 1980, at an estimated cost of $12 million.

have reached the point where we now feel that in all respect we must add our name to the list of people protesting the ambiguity of the original pamphlet." Regus Films also agreed to change the advertising for the films.

Hartl, who referred to last week's protest as a "pain in the ass," said he agreed with a Review article in last Friday's Varsity which discussed the "shock-titillation value" of words like Nazi and Hitler. Future propaganda films will cover the war years from the German point of view. Hartl says that the films will demonstrate how divorced from reality Nazi propaganda was during the time.

U of T's Athletic Complex, also known as Fort Jock, won't look like this for long. The massive trusses will go up in February.

Nazi show goes on

By RANDY WINTER

Yesterday's screening at Innis Town Hall of Nazi propaganda films went without protest. This was in marked contrast to the previous screening which was picketed by about 35 people who objected to the way the films had been promoted by Regus Films.

The decision to call off the protest followed a statement by Reg Hartl, manager of Regus Films, to the effect that Regus Films was not interested in using the films to promote fascism. The statement admitted that the promotion material had been allowed to "lapse into ambiguity" and ended with the statement: "We (Regus Films)

If you're about to be shot have a real good time

By TED STAUNTON

It's that time of year again. Days have become weeks, weeks have turned to months, and the months have become another year — except for February, which became an eggplant. And now, as leaves and hair change color and fall, many U of T students are confronted with the biggest test of their university careers — the grad photo.

To the unknowing first or second-year student the grad photo seems merely a good excuse to miss a class, but to a Grizzled Veteran it assumes the magnitude of, say, getting an essay extension and finding a subway token on the same day.

The point is that very soon, your face, freshly scrubbed, immaculately groomed, and encased in a black sheet trimmed with genuine raccoon, are going to be staring out from various mantelpieces around the nation, as well as from a composite shot of your class. The problem is how to make your grad photo distinctive.

Let's face it, this is not a problem to be underestimated. In the composite shot you're going to be one tiny face among a couple of hundred. At home and at the relatives you'll be fighting for space and attention with shots of brothers, sisters, cousins, the forty-pound muskie Uncle Herb caught, and Uncle Cosmo and his pet sheep.

Now unless you bear an uncanny resemblance to a major screen star, or perhaps a circus geek, getting attention in a crowd like that is going to take some doing. Fortunately, The Varsity just happens to have some suggestions to help make your grad photo a shot to remember. Having been voted "Most Drab and Least Distinctive" member of The Varsity staff myself, I can vouch for these methods personally. Before, people used to use pictures of me to start fires and bore unwanted guests. Now I am able to bring laughter into the lives of complete strangers.

(Should you feel that you don't need the following tips, being in first or second year, or unbearably good looking, or both, The Varsity suggests you clip this article out and give it to a friend, or save it in case you are hit by a bus.

1) For the conservative who prefers tried and true methods, wear the old favourites; an arrow through your head, or the fabulous glasses-nose-moustache combo. Good for boffo laughs.

2) If you are unwilling to invest in special equipment, insist on standing on your head for the photo session. If the photographer won't go along with this, you can always have a standard shot framed upside down.

3) If you are female, a false beard or moustache is distinctive. On the other hand, shaving your head completely bald has long been a favourite. Naturally, this opens up a wide range of possibilities for both men and women. Imagine your photo with half a moustache, or half a head of hair, or half of each on opposite sides!!! The mind boggles. The stomach turns.

4) Show up for your photo session naked. A real grabber.

5) Play hard-to-get for the camera; this coy approach is usually a big winner. Examples of this include peeking out from underneath a turned up turtle-neck sweater, turning your head to one side and raising your hands as if waving the camera away, or, for a truly sensational shot, wearing a paper bag over your head, with only the eye holes cut out.

6) Put a ring through your nose.

7) Do the old "Invisible Man" bit: wear glasses to the sitting, have your picture taken, then slip the photographer a few bucks to air-brush your head out of the picture but for the glasses. This technique is also handy if you are an escaped convict or have overdue library books and wish to maintain a low profile. People will stare for hours at your "portrait" trying to figure out just what is missing. Hilarious. Also popular: the "Cheshire Cat" smile.

8) Write "Hi mom!" across your teeth in indelible ink. The key here is to be imaginative — there are all kinds of slogans that will look great on your teeth. B. Comm. grads should use their marketing know-how to round up a couple of clients for the ad space on their teeth.

9) Use any combination of the above suggestions.

10) Insist on being photographed sucking your thumb.

The use of any of these attention-grabbers is guaranteed by The Varsity. However, don't be surprised if you get hauled off to a "rest home" right after you show your picture to the world. But then you should be expecting that anyway. You were crazy enough to go to U of T in the first place, right?

Profile: U of T's gold medal boxing champ

By ADAM KNELMAN-OSTRY

John Raftery returned triumphantly to Canada less than a month ago bearing the gold medal he won in the European Invitational Boxing Tournament in Finland. He is also a third year English student at University College and photography editor of The Gargoyle.

Raftery said boxing was "in his blood."

"My father taught me how to box when I was a kid. He trained me as far as he could and by that time I had reached a level of proficiency where I was really enjoying it, so I decided to keep at it. In the first year I found that my arm really hurt each time I trained so I decided I would pack it in. But I would go back just to keep in shape, and I got so involved again that I decided that I would keep going after all," he stated.

For Raftery, boxing is a sport providing both mental and physical stimuli which he says cannot be acquired in any other sport he has participated in. "There is a physical release that I don't find in most other things I do."

Raftery related that he had been boxing regularly for the past 5 or 6 years. He said he joined the Cabbagetown Boxing Club when he came to U of T two years ago because "quite frankly, I think it's the best. A lot of clubs have asked me to join but I didn't think that they were as good as Cabbagetown. Furthermore, Toronto is a great city and I wouldn't want to leave U of T either."

Raftery won the Ontario Championship in his weight class in 1972 and has been Ontario Champion ever since but in different weight classes. He won the Canadian Championship in 1976 and 1977. Winning runs in his family he said: his brother Cole (at Victoria College) was Canadian Champion in 1976 and another brother Barry is Canadian Champion in his weight class this year as well.

"I've mostly fought in Canada but I went to Denver and New York City as well," said Raftery. He fought in the Golden Gloves tournament in Hawaii last year which he lost by one fight to a boxer who has since turned professional.

Raftery said his first overseas tournament was hampered by the inexperience of the Canadian team. "There were five of us on it and we were the first Canadian team in an international competition of this size. We fought against Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Norway, Finland and West Germany. We achieved better results than anyone had anticipated. The West German whom I defeated to win the gold medal, had knocked out his previous opponent in 30 seconds with five quick punches."

European fighters have a style totally foreign to us, said Raftery. "They would try to knock you out as fast as they could. They didn't care about the number of times they got hit as long as they could throw a couple of hard punches at you."

International competition brings out patriotism, he said. "When you're in a strange country you really feel you're fighting for Canada. We carried the flag wherever we went. It wasn't at all like fighting in the U.S."

Boxing has never interfered with his academic life, Raftery said. "I practice about 15 to 20 hours a week, I have 14 hours of classes a week and the rest of the time is spent at parties, writing poetry, studying and eating. But right now I'm taking a two week break because I'm behind in my work. I manage to get by with a B average every year though. I work best under pressure. My social life isn't really hampered to any great extent either."

He explained that after a meal like spaghetti and beer, he warms up for two hours before going into a fight. "If my muscles are not perfectly tuned, then I'm no good. Ideally, I should really be nervous when I enter the ring. I don't think at all about the fight — if I did, it would take too much time and I'd get hit. Actually, I start humming to myself. I concentrate on speed and movement. However, I don't want to sound like an Ali — I take every fight very seriously. I would never want to enter a fight feeling overconfident — I'd probably lose."

Raftery comes from Elliot Lake in Northern Ontario, a town that has produced a generation of athletes, he said. He cited Brigitte Bitner of the high-jump team at the Canada student games, Larry Brown, an All-American Cross-Country runner and Dan Robitaille and Terry Hadlow of the Canadian Weightlifting Team.

"In the Canada Winter Games we got more medals than Sudbury did," he said.

"There's no way to account for it, and we did it all without government funding."

Raftery in some ways illustrates the predicament of Canadian amateur athletes. They work hard both at their sport and academics but can find no funds to support themselves.

He emphasized that steady funding over a five to six-year period is needed to train a crop of athletes capable of winning medals.

Although he has problems with his lungs, he plans to continue with boxing. "If I win the Canadian nomination, I'll go to the Commonwealth Games in July. I'll have to train in Toronto and I won't be able to get a summer job. There aren't any which pay nearly as much as I can make in the mine up north. But, if the Government comes through with the funds, I'll be all right. In any case, I'll be back at school in the fall. We'll see how it goes."

In this column, The Varsity will be examining from time to time the people who make up the U of T community. Varsity reporters will be interviewing various students, staff and faculty members, service workers and anyone else who has a place in this institution.

Koffman's jazz a museum piece.

About a month ago this writer received an invitation to a reception at the Royal Ontario Museum (ROM) in honor of Moe Koffman's latest album release. Why would anyone waste their money on champagne and Chinese delicacies for a lousy Varsity writer?

Apparently, the officials of the ROM have embarked on a new policy of "identify-with-the-public", and what better way than to associate their image with the exciting, vibrant spirit of jazz? They approached Koffman, Mr. Toronto Jazz Establishment himself, with the suggestion that he create an album dedicated to the Museum, patterning each tune after a particular gallery. Moe accepted the idea, and the end product, Museum Pieces, was unveiled to the press with a flourish.

For obvious reasons the reception was a great success, but the same cannot be said for the album. It's depressing to have to pan any jazz music, but this album bothers me. For starters, the incongruous match of jazz and the museum is played up and over-emphasized, resulting in the pretentiousness of liner notes like this one: "Rocks (Minerology)

— It's Rick Wilkin's composition... and it boasts a softly funky melody and hefty bottom, two qualities that neatly suggest the nature and range of the ROM's vast collection of minerals and gemstones, quartz and opals, diamonds and jade, almost every stone known to man, over 5,000 pieces in all, displayed in splendid, orderly and informative profusion..."

The music is as disappointing as the liner notes are contrived. It can be described as middle of the road commercial jazz-pap, although that may be overly harsh. Yet harsh words are appropriate when a group as talented and creative as the one Moe has selected here churn out as uninspiring a work. While each composition is no doubt pleasant, the musicians seem to have avoided the essence of the jazz idiom — collective interaction. The sound is sterile and the flute solos could just as easily have been dubbed in for all they relate to the other instruments.

Moe's partners in this venture include Ed Bickert, guitar, Don Thompson, keyboards, Rick Homme, bass, and Marty Morell on drums. All are excellent players, and Thompson particularly shines in this album, although his solos are too brief. It should be a crime to waste these artists on what amounts to a backup job for Moe's low-energy flute work, as in "Evolution Blues."

I could not recommend this record to any sincere jazz fan. But for lovers of quiet, easy going, soft jazz for background atmosphere, the album is quite suitable.

Strong Ice Hockey Comeback

By GLYNIS PETERS

What University of Toronto sporting event was covered last night by both CBC and Maclean's magazine? If you had watched CBC last night you would have seen our own Lady Blues Ice Hockey team on the screen. With many women and young girls asking to be allowed to play in men's leagues the sport is indeed a controversial issue at the moment. Judging by the talent on the U of T team the time for deriding those women playing this sacred male sport is long past. Dave McMaster, coach of the Blues, is noticing an influx of new players this year who have played the sport throughout high school. As a member of the Ontario Women's Ice Hockey Association, McMaster sees first hand the growth of this game. Not only are many high schools adopting ice hockey for women but city leagues are also springing up throughout Ontario.

Where does U of T fit in to this picture? The girls playing hockey here are definitely committed to the sport. Practices commence well before the season's opening and the turn out for trials was impressive this year. The team for the first time, has a lot of younger players, who though not taking that many shifts on the ice yet, have yet to be scored against.

A major problem at the moment, McMaster feels, is the large number of Faculty of Education students on the team. Nine players are at the faculty and during practice teaching sessions it is difficult for them to attend all games and practices. McMaster feels sure that were these people all undergraduates, Toronto would be leading the league, as the talent is undoubtedly present.

The team took on Guelph last night at Varsity Arena. Toronto was dominating the play in the first period when a Guelph shot hit the goalie's arm, bounced three or four feet into the air and dropped into the net, behind her. The first period ended with Guelph ahead 1-0 on this lucky break goal. In the second period, Toronto again dominated the play, but the puck seemed to find sticks and skates instead of the net. By the end of the second period the score was 2-0 for Guelph, the second goal being a clear shot for the Gryphons.

Undaunted, the Blues took to the ice and continued to outplay the opposition. Guelph, a good checking team, seemed to be able to keep the Blues away from their net. Toronto determination paid off, however, when Linda Harley scored followed by another quick Toronto goal to end the game on a tie.

During the game, Valerie Bush suffered an injury, to join Cathy Brown, also injured after coming off a successful Field Hockey season, on the bench.

This year the league is using female referees as opposed to Metro Toronto Hockey League referees. McMaster said that the male refs were fired because of their disrespectful attitude towards the women. They just didn't want to take women ice hockey players seriously. Nothing could be more discouraging than having to deal with an official who was treating the event as a joke. This is a problem that ice hockey has to deal with constantly. There is no reason why it should not engender as much respect as that afforded other sports played at the University level.

The team continues the season with an exhibition game on November 21 and the next league game on November 25 against Queen's. The latter will take place at Varsity Arena and if you caught them on the news last night and want to see more, come and cheer the Lady Blues on. Barring McMaster, long the strongest team in the league, Toronto is a prime contender for the finals this year, come and watch what may be the start of their climb to the top!

Women Arise and Write

Whether you can write a thesis on Women in Sport in the space of half an hour or can only jot down who scored the goals, sunk the baskets or ran the fastest, there is a place to use your talent.

The Varsity needs Women's Sports writers! You may come in person, to the second floor Varsity office and talk to Glynis Peters, or wishing to protect your Absolutely no experience is necessary, but you're guaranteed to gain some if you decide to contribute!

Erindale New Champs

By MARIA KALIN

Last Tuesday morning, November 8, saw the finals of this year's Interfaculty Women's Field Hockey. The field conditions were poor due to previous rain, but the Erindale Girls overcame this problem to defeat PHE 2-1 in a hard fought battle. Goal scorers for Erindale were Cathy McKay and Bonnie McLeod. The teams were evenly matched with play moving up and down the field. Both teams had equal opportunity to score and provided excellent goal tending. Congratulations to Erindale!

Erindale and PHE earned their way to the finals the previous week in two very competitive games. In the last minute of play the PHE girls scored against Vic to make the final score PHE 2 and Vic 1, knocking Vic out of further competition. In the Meds vs Erindale game the final score was 0-0 at the end of the game. The two teams went into overtime penalty strokes. Again, despite excellent goal tending, Erindale scored, leaving the final score at Erindale 1 and Meds 0.

The interfac season was very successful this year with no teams defaulting. The Calibre of play increased over the season, making it necessary for all teams to work on both offensive and defensive plays. In closing, I would like to thank all teams for participating and a special thanks goes to all the umpires for showing, rain or shine!

Rugby 7's Reach Final

U of T's 7-a-side Rugby team reached the finals of the Formosa Cup York Invitational tournament held in Waterloo last Saturday. On route to the final game with Queen's, U of T beat McMaster, Waterloo and Western.

U of T's team was comprised of first team players from this year's 15-a-side squad. Dave Taylor, Bob Smyth, Mark Harper, Bill Nankivell and Charlie Singer rotated at the three forward positions with Neil Sorbie, John Gibson, Bob Seymour and Nick Beveridge making up the back line.

In the first two games, U of T easily dealt with their opponents marking up one-sided victories. Bob Seymour provided most of the scoring punch for the Blues, running for several tries in addition to kicking converts. Mark Harper (2), Sorbie (1) and Singer (1) also scored tries.

In the third game against a tougher Western team, Nick Beveridge teamed up with Dave Taylor for two tries and then connected on a pretty pass play with John Gibson to score a third. Seymour also scored a try against Western.

Unfortunately for U of T the result of the championship game was in favour of Queen's by a score of 12-0. Both teams were hampered by a snow and ice-covered field and freezing winds.

Despite the loss in the finals U of T can be proud of their effort on the day. The team was only selected the day before the tourney and had never played together as a unit before the opening kickoff.

Yeoman Win National Soccer Crown

SPORTS

The Varsity

York shows the form against the Blues that led them to the Canadian championship.

The York Yeomen won the national soccer championship with a come-from-behind 2-1 victory over the Concordia Stingers in a game played in Waterloo Sunday. The Yeomen, who entered the game undefeated, rallied in the second half after falling behind on a goal by Concordia's Pasquale D'Tolo with 30 seconds left in the half.

When the Yeomen entered the dressing room at half time there were many who doubted that they would be able to come back in the second half. Concordia was playing well while the Yeomen were visibly down after their last minute letdown.

York however, came out strong in the second half putting considerable pressure on the Stingers. Their efforts paid off with two goals a minute apart.

Both goals were set up by the corner kicks of Peter Kovacs. On the first, Nick Plessas managed to relay the kick into the net while the second was scored off the head of veteran Mac Musabay. Musabay's effort earned him the most valuable player award of the tournament.

The game was rough, and saw players ejected from both teams. Ado D'Alfonso of York was thrown out for kicking and Concordia's Marty Arh was ejected shortly after. As well as the ejections the referee was forced to levy five cautions.

The Yeomen got to the final by beating Dalhousie 5-3 in a wide open game, and narrowly getting by Manitoba in a defensive 2-1 overtime win.

Waterloo won the consolation tournament by defeating Dalhousie 3-1.

Side Line By-Line

By HUGH STUART

Last week, Alan Eagleson commented to the press about the attendance problems of some National Hockey League franchises. I wonder what 'the Eagle' would have to say about the University of Toronto franchise. Probably something along the lines of the following:

"Jeez, even I can't figure this one out. I mean they've got the best and most exciting team in their league, maybe in the whole country, yet bobby Orr has more stitches on his kness than the Blues' average home attendance. It's really a sad situation. Maybe I could move the team to Cleveland."

How is it that the biggest drawing card in arenas around the OUAA are the Blues yet at home they've drawn less than 500 fans a game? How is it that 6,000 University of Western Ontario fans attended a football game between the Mustangs and the feeble York Yeomen (and they don't even allow booze in the stadium) while the football Blues didn't draw 6,000 once this season? Poor attendance might be understood (but not justified) if the U of T teams were losers. However, in view of the quality of the Varsity teams the students have no such excuse.

Since it was a comment by hockey Blues coach, Tom Watt, that prompted this column, let's stick to the hockey situation. Watt said that, "The players are very upset by the lack of fan support they are receiving this season."

Should the lack of attendance bother the players? You better believe it. When they step on the ice in front of another paltry home crowd, what goes through the mind of a Doug Caines who has played in Madison Square Gardens (New York), or Neil Korzack who was in the Buffalo Sabres organization, or Dan Tsubouchi who played in front of large crowds for four years at the University of St. Louis, or Cary Farelli . . . ? It must be pretty hard to dedicate yourself.

If you think that the pressure of tests, essays, labs, etc. is getting to you, try and put yourself in the position of a Blues player who has to combine daily practices home games and road trips with his academics. These players make great sacrifices to represent the U of T and the least they expect in return is fan support.

Did you know that the Blues won a larger percentage of their games on the road than at home? One of the reasons for this is that the players are clearly the villains in the opposition rinks and the home fans let them know it. With such electricity in the air, each player is inspired to give his best. With the exception of the playoffs, the only electricity at Blues home games runs through wires.

Watt points out that although the games are poorly attended there is a lot of pressure from within the university for the Blues to win. This is a pretty unjust situation, but sadly it's true. Think about it. Don't you expect the hockey Blues to go all the way again this year? Do you feel the same way about the rest of the teams at this university? If those teams win it's a moderate surprise. If they lose well hey that's tough, but what the hell, it's a tough league, eh? But if the hockey Blues win you know it all along; if they lose then the students turn into armchair critics. At least the fans could come out and see for themselves before they criticize.

One thing is certain; the success of the U of T teams affects the prestige of the university. Why else would American universities spend the hundreds of thousands of dollars that they do on sports programs? U of T gained a great deal of prestige both across Canada and internationally with their trip to China last year. How did they get to make that trip? By being winners, and to be a winner a team can only benefit from fan support. Maybe you're right in thinking that the U of T teams (both men's and women's) are so good that they don't need your support at their games. Maybe you do have better things to do with your spare time (although the Blues provide good and inexpensive entertainment). Maybe it is passe to line up at Hart House for season tickets for Blues hockey games like students did five years ago. Maybe . . .

What it boils down to is a matter of pride. Is the lack of attendance that has become chronic in all sports at this university really a sign of the times; or is it true that the students simply don't have enough pride to be bothered to support those who make an effort to represent them?

Interfac Report

By ANDRIS AUZINS

We're into the winter sports season now so there's a need for a little reorganizing around the old office. If you read these weekly entries (I've been told that some people do!), and have been disappointed with the quality if not the quantity of the reporting, I have a suggestion for you: now that you've settled into the school year why don't you discover if you have a penchant for producing totally original and otherwise spectacular Interfac reports. It's really a riot and the parties are something else, although they don't let me come, but you can write letters to the editor. Seriously, if you'd like to do a little dabbling in sportswriting, it doesn't take long, it's not overly difficult and it may well be the only thing new or different that you'll do this year.

Let's have a little rehash of the past three weeks since most of the new sports have been operating for that long anyhow. (Little bit o' standin' in order 'ere Cap'n.) Finally Vic College has come up with a team consistent with that school's tradition in Interfac. Vic's hockey team is sporting an undefeated string of three games due to their fast start. Coach Dave Wardlaw has the squad dominating their opposition and the scoring is well distributed indicating a balanced attack. Bill McFarland has two goals and two assists, Bob Isles and Mark Wheeler are two and one and Vic Langley has potted one and assisted on two.

Erindale and Scarborough are right behind and should be strong over the season. Defending champions St. Mike's, are off to a slow start winning only one of their first three games.

Horse Play

By ADAM KNELMAN-OSTRY

The third intercollegiate dressage and stadium jumping championship for college and university teams from across Ontario will take place this weekend at the Hamilton Equestrian Centre. The event, sponsored by the College and Universities Riding Association of Canada and hosted by McMaster University, is intended not only as a student horse show, but also as a function to promote and develop all levels of student riders and encourage their participation in equestrian events. Although the Toronto team of Geoff Vernon, Adam Conyers, Sue Ferguson, Cam Thomson and Mary Saunders have been working together for less than a week, they expect to give the more established teams from the University of Guelph and Humber College some stiff competition, especially in the jumping phase of the competition.

Unlike conventional horse shows, horses supplied by each team are pooled, rated according to their ability and then randomly drawn by each team, whose responsibility it then becomes to assign riders to each horse. Only by riding unfamiliar horses through dressage tests and over fences can the abilities of each competitor be fairly assessed. This will no doubt prove to be an exciting and colourful intercollegiate competition and one well worth seeing. The Hamilton Equestrian Centre is located on Leeming Road just south of Highway No. 6 in Mount Hope.

Trudeau talks at Birchmont Park

By ANDREW MAHON

In the middle of a two-day visit to Toronto, Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau appeared at Birchmont Park Collegiate to answer questions about national unity, unemployment and the RCMP.

Students packed the school auditorium for the 75-minute question and answer period with the PM who was immediately questioned about the recent activities of the RCMP.

"I don't think politicians should know in any detail what the police are doing," said Trudeau, "but that doesn't mean they won't make mistakes."

One student asked the PM if the RCMP would have files on party leaders like Ed Broadbent, Joe Clark and even Trudeau himself. Trudeau explained that he didn't know whether or not there was a file on him, but admitted the possibility.

"I visited Russia in 1952, and Franco's Spain in 1946 and naturally when you're a bit of an oddball like me, the police will probably have a file on you. So what?"

Students also asked the Prime Minister about national unity. Trudeau emphasized that the Canadian government must create conditions which will make all Canadians including Quebecers realize they are better off within the present constitution.

"The key to the Quebec problem," said Trudeau, "is to make Quebec feel at home in the rest of the country."

When asked about the proposed referendum in Quebec, Trudeau was openly skeptical. "If Levesque's party thought it could win a referendum, they'd hold it now," said the PM. "Quebec did not want to separate in the past and they don't want to separate now."

Trudeau also talked about the economy and the "happy medium" between stimulating the economy and causing inflation. On one hand, said the PM, the government tries to create jobs by stimulating the economy but on the other hand if the government tries to stimulate the economy too much, inflation is bound to become a problem.

Nevertheless, Trudeau had some encouraging words for the young members of his audience. "Canada has an incredible future — I preach optimism: don't be despondent, don't be discouraged, there are a lot of people who would give their right leg and right arm to have the opportunities you have."

Can you fire a tenured prof?

By HARRY TORCH

A minor point in the Governing Council's guidelines for the 1977-78 budget evolved into serious discussion on the removal of tenured staff at last night's Governing Council meeting when Administrative Staff representative James Kraemer claimed that "reduction of staff" at U of T means essentially reduction of non-academic staff.

Kraemer said that the guidelines contained methods for removing non-academic staff but the university "does not have policies and guidelines for terminating academic staff for financial reasons."

University President John Evans admitted that the university has no guidelines for termination of tenured positions. But he pointed out that the university usually is not able to make appointments in the tenure stream, and offers only term appointments. This policy has been kept since the university made the decision not to grow several years ago, he added.

Evans pointed out the difference between turnover rates for academic and non-academic staff as one reason for the higher reduction of non-academic staff complement. But, he said, "the university has a responsibility to all its staff. It is a matter of making the university as functional as possible," and the academic staff are just as important, he maintained.

"The university has always refused to come to terms with the removal of academic staff" student representative Michael Treacy said. He pointed out that the university in its budget recommendations only considered three methods of cutting the budget: trying to increase income, excising programs, and lowering salary increases. The latter, he added, is not an option since the agreement between the Governing Council and the U of T

Faculty Association.

"I'm surprised we had not explored the area of releasing academic staff," Treacy said. "I don't know why we don't have a review of the policy towards tenured staff."

Kraemer said the non-renewal of term appointments — one of the methods of cutting back academic appointments mentioned — was different from terminating continuing appointments. "The shock of a non-academic person who has been working for three years is much greater," he said.

Kraemer pointed out that the American universities' faculty associations have accepted guidelines for terminating tenured appointments. He said he would give notice of motion that the university should look into the same thing.

PIXIE BID FAILS

Administrative staff member Michael Bliss came under attack for his "one-man crusade against student organizations" when he tried to get a motion recognizing the Association of Part-Time Undergraduate Students (APUS) and the Graduates Student Union (GSU) as representative of the part-time undergraduate and graduate students respectively sent back to the Internal Affairs Committee again — a motion which had previously been referred back last May.

For his efforts Bliss was subjected to ridicule by Treacy, Government appointee Sidney Hermant — who called him a "pixie" — and APUS President Maria Hutchinson, who even managed a pun on his name.

Governing Council finally defeated Bliss' attempt and now officially recognizes the GSU and APUS.

Eng prexy nixes pumpkins tab says: "We have our limits"

By LEON KING

A bill for $225.90 is on its way from U of T Physical Plant to Joe Lstiburek, Engineering Society President, for damages done to the Students' Administrative Council (SAC) building on a Halloween evening raid.

On October 31, several truckloads of pumpkins were dumped into the SAC office necessitating more than a day's work by two men and a truck to repair the aftermath. Hardest hit was SAC president John Tuzzy's office.

Lstiburek said the society will not pay the bill. He added that "the degree of organization implied that engineers were behind it, but the Engineering Society will not be held responsible for wanton acts carried out by its members."

According to Bill Hutter, responsible for invoices at Physical Plant, the bill does not include all the costs of the damages, just labor and use of tools for removal of the pumpkins. Whether an additional bill for the cleaning of carpets and telephone repair will be presented is as yet unknown.

Billing was authorized by Cyril Davies, maintenance supervisor of the area, who was in charge of the clean-up. Davies said it was his belief that engineers were responsible.

Investigation of the raid is being handled by Sergeant Panzer of U of T police. He said he received the license plate number of the truck used from a bystander but still had not received identification of the vehicle from the Department of Transport. Panzer said the matter was not high on his list of priorities.

Lstiburek, who said he was too busy to make the raid, pointed out that in the past the Engineering Society had been willing to own up to any damages caused in an organized event, and in a few cases out of kindness, pay for damages caused by engineers in other circumstances, but that there was a limit to what they could afford.

Lstiburek also revealed that he had heard about the possibility of the raid some time before it occurred and discussed it with people at SAC, but he thought the target would be The Varsity instead.

The Varsity was never warned.

Future with plastics certain

By SELWYN FIRTH

Plastics are here to stay in spite of problems with pollution, said U of T professor James Guillet in a Sesquicentennial lecture at New College on Wednesday.

Guillet, a leading Canadian researcher in biodegradable plastics, outlined the problems and their possible cures for pollution by litter. He began by pointing out the tremendous saving in energy to be gained if plastic containers were used instead of paper and glass, since plastic is much cheaper to manufacture.

Plastics can also conserve arable lands for production of food, he said. Using simple mathematics, he proved that at least 40 million acres of land would be required to grow the cotton needed to replace the 20 billion pounds of synthetic fibres now in use.

Furthermore, he said, if the synthetics were replaced by wool instead of cotton, between one and 10 billion acres of land would be required for raising the sheep.

Guillet admitted there is a problem with litter of all kinds. His recognition of the importance of biodegradable containers led to his work on a material that would decompose into natural components. He has since succeeded in creating one. The problem now is getting people to use his material, he stated. At present his material costs about 20 per cent more than conventional materials, but Guillet said that if larger quantities were made, the cost could be reduced to more competitive prices.

Guillet cited the Club of Rome report that predicted vast accumulation of litter on the earth by the year 2030. Using the report's data and substituting degradable for non-degradable elements, he calculated, using U of T computers, that if all packages manufactured from 1975 onwards had a lifetime of two months, even if people littered twice as much as they now do, there would be less litter in the year 2030 than there is today.

For the future, Guillet saw an even greater use of synthetic materials in order to maintain the present standard of living.

Study returning students' needs

By STEPHANIE ORTENZI

There ought to be a task force or some preparation for weaning the returning student into the fabric of the university, said Professor Northrop Frye. He spoke Wednesday to returning students at the Newman Centre. His speech was sponsored by the association of Undergraduate Full-time Adult Students (UFAS) and the student council (SAC).

"The university is large and bureaucratic . . . It passed its optimum size long ago," said Frye. His long-held opinion has been that "there are two kinds of universities: the kind that are too big and those that are going to get too big."

The return to education comes from a need for further education in drastically changing fields. This social movement, he said, demands a new structure for the university.

Frye said retraining involves teachers and the work force. His own return to U of T as an instructor required what he called "the fastest form of education" — to teach a course out of his specialty.

UFAS president Larry Hawn, pointed out returning students' tendency to be passive and absorbed. He suggested that undergraduates should do some tutoring. Frye thought this "monitor system was admirable," and that "the student instinct is a jam."

Frye stated that the ideal university must be "more liberal than utilitarian." Education must be "a profound experience" as it is when courses converge historically. The honor system worked well in this respect, when he was an undergraduate in 1933, Frye related. He reminisced that the Renaissance was covered by all his courses in one year, the eighteenth century in the next, and the nineteenth century in the following. This organization led to the satisfaction he felt when his separate studies converged.

With all its apparent shortcomings, Frye supports the college system. It makes the university "less monolithic." Unfortunately, he said, the system tends to grow beyond itself and cited Victoria College with its population of 2,000 to 2,500 students. He said it was healthy to have many "well-spirited students" but stressed their motivation rather than their numbers.

He criticized the "centralization of the university, which leads to a large and invisible bureaucracy ruling the university."

Frye agreed with a member of the audience that French and German high schools are generally better than Canadian ones. Europe's class difference allows adult education to continue for working people, he said. The broadcasted courses of the University of the Air attract students more interested in the subject than in the degrees, Frye told the group that if, in Canada, these kind of people could join the university community "they could get a taste of a life where intellect has a place."

The disenchantment adult students suffer on their return to school was raised. Frye answered there was no remedy for this "decease of education."

Bureaucracy, stated Frye, is unavoidable. "Political and economic movements tend to centralize. Social movements tend to decentralize." He stated that the university must follow this "decentralized rhythm," — an inevitable process because "culturally we are all separatists."

Bloomsbury: cliquish

By LESLIE GOODING

The two faces of the famous Bloomsbury group were the subject of a lecture given by Nigel Nicolson, author of the controversial Portrait of a Marriage and co-editor of the Virginia Woolf letters.

Speaking to about 150 people at University College, Nicolson explained that the Bloomsbury Group — which included Virginia Woolf, John Maynard Keynes and E.M. Forster — made many outstanding contributions to literature, art, philosophy and political economy.

Nicolson, the son of two peripheral members of the group, drew on his personal experience and knowledge of the letters in his talk.

In the country, the Bloomsbury Group were gentle, affectionate and very careful of each other and of their friendship. In London, they were fierce, competitive, exclusive, and undeniably arrogant, he said.

Bloomsbury originated as a group of Cambridge undergraduates around 1901. They were elected to a semi-secret society known as the Apostles and met for semi-philosophical discussions.

When they graduated with firsts, they took cheap lodgings in the Bloomsbury district that were close to libraries and the British museum.

Their society was drastically changed by the introduction of two young women, Virginia and Vanessa Stevens, who were the sisters of one of the members. They were "horrified by how ugly and boring" their brother's friends were. Vanessa in particular brought a completely new spirit to the group, Nicolson said. She was the real mover behind Bloomsbury.

Nicolson discussed the nature of their association. They led a simple life but a generous one, and there was always a hot meal and money for friends. They were criticized for their flirtatiousness, but infidelities were life-long. When Vanessa left her husband for another man, he pointed out, she stayed with him until the end. He noted the great tradition of wit in the group. At Cambridge one couldn't say anything witty unless it was also profound. At Bloomsbury, one couldn't say anything profound unless it was also witty," Nicolson explained.

Bloomsbury contributed to the overturning of Victorian standards, said Nicolson. They challenged the prevailing attitudes in almost every field, and at the same time, didn't hesitate to criticize one another's works. They differed from their countrymen by being great pacifists.

While Nicolson stressed the group's honesty, he also noted their limitations, and one was prejudice. They didn't like Jews or Americans. This is especially surprising, because Leonard Woolf was Jewish. The fact that some of their friends were American — T.S. Eliot for one — was awkward.

They were also malicious, partly as a protection against teasing and partly because of jealousy. He cited Virginia Woolf's jealousy of Katherine Mansfield and the members' intense rivalry of each other.

Bloomsbury was cold to outsiders. "Their alleged arrogance was at times intolerable," Nicolson said. They were exclusive of people who didn't share the in-jokes. They were highly critical, snobbish and merciless in their condemnation of the uneducated as uninteresting. Writing of the working class, Virginia Woolf found "their voices, their clothes and their bad teeth intolerable" and claimed that because of their "terrific conventionality," they wouldn't "be poets or novelists for another hundred years."

Nicolson regretted that he didn't have time to discuss Virginia Woolf's feminism. He did say that he thought too much emphasis had been placed on this role, especially in the United States. Woolf's contribution lay largely in her urging of women's education and entry into the professions.

In the question period Nicolson was asked if Bloomsbury could happen again. He said that while there was no obstacle, it was a very rare phenomenon. "A grouping of people with wholly original minds was wholly salutary," and he wished it would happen again.

Do it -- if it's allowed

By KEN WHITEHURST

Demonstrators chanting "Make the rich pay, make the poor pay, make everyone pay" disrupted the flow of pedestrians from Sidney Smith Hall at noon yesterday. Hundreds of spectators gathered to watch the demonstration by the "People Against Oppression and State Organized Organizations (PAOSOO)."

Revolting PAOSOO vice-president Paul Budra screamed to the listening throng, "The upper class fears us, and rightly so. The middle class fears us, and rightly so. The lower class has never heard of us, and rightly so. Obscurity is its own reward. When the time comes we shall leap from darkness into the spotlight of public ridicule."

The PAOSOO may soon be in the spotlight because they have applied to the Internal Affairs Committee of the Governing Council for recognition as a bona fide campus group. They made this application, Budra said, because they want to have an information table in the Sidney Smith lobby. Explained PAOSOO president Steve Petranik, "We are the Gulf Dealers of the revolution. We check your dialectic and find it wanting. We want to make the wheels of the revolution spin."

Stressing the import of the movement, Budra warned the crowd, "The true movement to liberate the people of their burdens and their self-respect is all too easily waylaid by those who lay in wait waiting to be laid."

The symbol of the movement is the duck. The group offered no explanation for their choice, but their enthusiastic support for the emblem showed itself when they quacked their support for their leaders.

The group advocates protesting the perpetuation of the peoples' struggle against the peoples' oppression of the people; supporting the struggle of the people for the people against the people; and making the rich pay for the struggle of the masses according to the group's manifesto.

PAOSOO Secretary Neil Michael Davidson promised the gathered crowd, "We can do anything that we are allowed to do. We can choose to change; we can change our choices. You choose," he continued, "the choice is yours. We the people against oppression and state-organized organizations have changed and made such a choice. We are revolting. You are revolting."

Exhorting U of T students to join the cause, PAOSOO Ombudsman Cim Michiasiu shouted to the laughing crowd: "Open your mouths and give voice to the quacks you feel."

PAOSOO members are also staff members of the Varsity newspaper.

Perspectives: le cafe avec un peu de theatre

Après le cafe au lait, la France exporte le cafe-theatre. Descendant direct du Cafe-Concert 1900, illustre par Toulouse-Lautrec, le cafe-theatre reprend la tradition d'un theatre populaire qui trouve tout naturellement sa place place et son public dans le "cafe du coin." Le cafe est l'inevitable halte dans la vie quotidienne, ou s'échangent les nouvelles publiques et privées, ou chacun devient conteur face à un public familier, tour à tour enthousiaste ou chahuteur mais toujours chaleureux. Puis, le conteur occasionnel met des rimes à ses mots, une musique sur ses paroles et monte sur une scene improvisée: une scene ouverte sur la salle, sans la barrière des feux de la rampe et baptisée du seul nom du "bistrot" qui l'abrite.

Coupe-chou-Beaubourg, Veuve-Richard, le Cafe de la Gare, la Cour des Miracles, le Theatre des 400 Coups, le Splendid, le Petit-bain: ils ont conquis Paris, puis la province. Vic Cafe-theatre, UC Cafe-Theatre: la bataille de Toronto est engagée! Le premier assaut a eu pour cadre Terrace Room a Victoria College, lundi dernier. Les combattants (tous volontaires) de Victoria ont brandi une arme bien pacifique: l'humour.

Le spectacle a commencé par un French Can-can ediable, puis des sketches se sont succédés, mis en scene par Alain Perraudin et interprétés (entre autres) par Ghislaine Grosman, lectrice et David Smith, chef du département de français de U of T et professeur a Victoria. Et tout finit par des chansons, comme il se doit, sous une salve d'applaudissements.

Deja, des troupes fraîches se preparent a prendre la relève. A l'appel du Cercle français de University College dont la presidente est Corinne Wyat, assistée de Suzy Restivo at Meruel MacCabe, des lecteurs charges de cours de français se mobilisent: a Ne College, Jim Hassel et Dominique Levy, a Trinity College Daniele Issa-Sayeg, a University College Christine Chambeffort, Nicole Sevestre et Rachid Sagide.

Les étudiants se joignent a eux pour se lancer dans d'inattendues mais passionnantes carrieres: de costumier, metteur en scene, regisseur, maquilleur, scenariste, publiciste, et pour les moins timides (ou les plus inconscients), comedien.

Au fil des repetitions en français, les murs de la Senior Common Room de Sir Daniel Wilson's Residence resonnent des accents les plus varies, plus ou moins hesitants. Mais tous unis par la meme volonte: ar-ti-cu-ler! Ceux pour qui le français n'a (presque) plus de secrets figoient leur diction. Les autres contournaient la difficulté en s'inventant des roles muets.

La principale qualite' du Cafe-Theatre est en effet de donner leur chance a tous les talents, et en particulier a celui d'un public dont on attend la plus large participation. Le cafe-theatre, c'est avant tout un lieu de rencontre: autour d'un verre et d'une chanson, chacun s'exprime a sa façon et partage avec tous vin et applaudissements.

Acteurs et spectateurs: un meme slogan: l'imagination au pouvoir! Ses ministres? Un mime, des guitaristes, des chanteurs, un poete, l'absurde Ionesco, dans un extrait de la Lecon, un bourgeois gentilhomme, un maître de philosophie, un menage a trois dans un extrait de "Occupe toi d'Amelie" de Feydeau, des sketches et enfin un pianiste pour tout accompagner.

Changes on campus

By GRACE ANOBILE

Universities are turning out super-technicians but fewer educated people.

That's what Dr. Roger Gaudry, former president of the University of Montreal, told an audience at the Medical Science Auditorium Tuesday night. Gaudry, a Rhodes scholar, was lecturing on the place of the university in society, and he did so in French and English.

"Before, an arts degree was a prerequisite for medical and law faculties. Today it is not so. We have experts and specialists, but there is no more development of knowledge and culture," he said.

Gaudry explained that the university should have three functions in Canadian society: to train professionals, to develop knowledge and culture, and to function as a critic of society.

"This last function is almost a prophetic role. It has existed for centuries and is closely tied to the level of freedom in certain countries."

Varg meet

There will be yet another Varsity staff meeting this afternoon at 2 p.m. Among the topics on the agenda of this week's meeting will be the newspaper's allocation of pages, the National Union of students (NUS), the selection of delegates to the CUP 40 conference in Halifax, Friday's controversial SAC article, and new layout proposals.

According to Gaudry, when the Church ceased to be French-Canada's critic, "many faculty members became our new clerics and cannaans."

Gaudry said that today, faculty members enjoy a high income and status with good working conditions. The trend of unionization of faculty members is a threat to the university for it will limit creativity, he said.

"Universities are no longer dominated by the Church but are instead funded by the State. The result is that graduates are no longer versed in morality, ethics, and the values of society."

He does not advocate a return of the church-controlled university but would like to see the university as a place where those with a passion for knowledge can gather. It must be more than a technical training ground, he argued.

Looking back at the history of the university, its role, he said, is basically the same as it was in medieval days — to provide graduates for the immediate needs of society. But, it used to be an elitist institution for the upper-classes. Today the university is accessible to all classes of society, and, as a result, they are churning out many graduates that society cannot use, he said.

"Imagine a big dam without enough turbines built in. The water is not utilized and spills over the dam. I hope we don't send too many graduates over the dam," he said.

PART TIME EMPLOYMENT AVAILABLE - $4.00 per hr.

Letter in Globe and Mail

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprise. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university.

The Varsity is managed by the Varsity Committee which is responsible for the management, financial policies, and editorial integrity of The Varsity.

An express function of the committee is to receive and consider complaints about the paper. Formal complaints — as opposed to letters to the editor — should be addressed to: The Chairman, Varsity Committee, 91 St. George St., Toronto, Ontario.

Varsity gets the SAC

With all due respect, I would like to suggest that the Varsity is not fulfilling its responsibilities as a student newspaper.

According to the Canadian University Press (CUP) Code of Ethics, "all members of the student press... are responsible journalists and must act accordingly; be fair and accurate in their reports and not falsify information or distort or misrepresent facts." Furthermore, the CUP Code of Ethics goes on to state that "The editor should rectify in print, at the first available opportunity, all culpable mistakes."

In a lengthy Varsity Committee meeting held on Monday, it was brought to your attention that the article "SAC a corporate baron — union" contained, (in addition to the hearsay allegations being apologized for on the front page of today's Varsity) a number of factual errors.

A motion by some members of the Committee to print such corrections as were deemed necessary resulted in a tie and was defeated. However, I feel it is your responsibility, as editor of the Varsity, and as author of the article to correct in print the "culpable mistakes".

In particular: (referring to the article)

1. CUPE Local 1222 did not file a grievance with regard to the matter of the July heat wave.

2. The fact that SAC and the union did come to an acceptable agreement regarding the employment of Mr. Charney is made clear in a memorandum signed by SAC, the union, and the employee.

3. SAC, in fact, has employed a lawyer for labour legal services for the past year and a half.

As much as I would like to believe that you try to be fair at all times, articles such as last Friday's lend no support to your position as a "responsible (student) journalist".

Check your facts

Since Reg Hartt admonished Martin Heavisides to "research the facts a bit more" (Varsity, November 14), it seems not inappropriate to note a few problems in Mr. Hartt's own letter.

1. "The film of Metropolis is based on an experience of Lang and his wife, Thea von Harbou upon seeing the New York skyline for the first time in 1924; the book, by Thea von Harbou, was published in the same year." Lang was on a business trip to America with three associates; his wife wasn't with him. The book was not published until 1926, the year the film was completed.

2. "The man who owned UFA studios... was Alfred von Hugenberg." Hugenberg (not von Hugenberg) did not own UFA until after Metropolis was completed; in fact, UFA was on the verge of bankruptcy due to the exorbitant production costs of Metropolis when Hugenberg bought controlling interest in 1927.

3. "On February 1, 1933, Hugenberg... was dismissed and Walther Darre took his position." On January 30, 1933, Hugenberg was sworn into the office of Minister of Economy and Agriculture in Hitler's cabinet. He was removed from this office in June, 1933, and replaced by Darre. The position had nothing to do with UFA.

4. "Darre was a NDSAP leader." That should be NSDAP. Hugenberg was not a Nazi, but he had involved his own right-wing National People's Party deeply with the Nazis.

5. "Hugenberg died shortly after." He didn't die until 1951.

6. "Fritz Lang was a German Jew and the Nazis told him that this would not matter." Lang was Austrian, and not a Jew, although his mother was born Jewish (but raised as a Catholic). This Jewish background would still have given him great difficulties with the Nazis, but it is not clear from Lang's own recounting of the interview with Goebbels that the latter either knew or mentioned this problem (see Paul Jensen: The Cinema of Fritz Lang, and Mark Shivas' interview with Lang in Movie, No. 2, Sept. 1962).

7. "Nothing more was heard from her (von Harbou)." More WAS heard from her: she had some small success as a screen writer and director, both during and after World War II, in Germany.

I don't know whether Mr. Hartt's comments on Eisenstein are more accurate than those on Lang; I hope so. Practice what you preach, Mr. Hartt. And since Martin Heavisides challenged none of your factual errors in his reply to you (Varsity, November 16) he should also pay closer attention to your sermon.

Innis slandered

I protest Mario Cutajar's misleading letter of November 14, 1977. Cutajar stated that during the time he was at the demonstration of November 8, he did not hear anyone accuse Reg Hartt or Regus Films of being Fascist. He also stated that "what was being protested by those who signed the petition and picketed the films was not the content but the promotion." These statements are not necessarily untrue, but I view it as significant that Cutajar omitted mentioning the "promotion" of the protesting group itself, which included a statement of the purpose of the demonstration that I found to be offensive.

The widely distributed posters which publicized the November 8th picket stated that: "These films are not a mere 'cultural event'. They serve to embolden those dedicated to the genocide of ethnic and racial minorities, and the destruction of labour organizations and democratic rights." NQ PLATFORM FOR FASCISTS! The poster also deceptively stated that "previous Nazi propaganda films shown at Innis have been a rallying point for Fascist organizations." The presence of any significant number of Fascists at a Regus screening has not been obvious to me, nor I would imagine, to anybody who ever attended the "Propaganda" screenings out of a serious interest in film history.

I consider that the protesters' promotion is slanderous to Innis College's good name. I consider Cutajar's letter supporting a protest which was based on half-truths and deliberate misunderstandings, to be an insult to my intelligence and my integrity as a worker at Innis.

This entire "Propaganda Incident" bears witness to something that I have always believed in: the power of the Media to convince us of that which is not worthy of belief.

Raze Roberts

Nine months ago to the day, on 18 March 1977, in a letter to the editor of the Varsity, I advocated the demolition of the John P. Roberts Research Library and announced the formation of a pressure group, Students for the Nirvanal Abolition of the Roberts Library (SNARL). To summarize, our reasons for desiring this somewhat extreme action had and still have nothing to do with its content, operation, or even the esthetics (or lack thereof) of its design, but rather the gale-force winds which continually blow around it, threatening the lives and property of passers-by. We offered the university administration five suggestions for methods of demolition of this menace.

I realize that the wheels of bureaucracy turn slowly, but November is here and those winds are getting cold.

While there has been no action from the university administration, there has been contact. I was called to a secret meeting with Dr. Evans in an underground parking garage. He offered me a PhD in Far-Eastern Studies at fall convocation on the condition that I would continue my studies in the Far East, and he didn't mean Newfoundland. Being a man of principle, I refused. I would have taken at least a PhD in CanLit to break my resolve. As I was leaving that rendezvous, someone tried to run me down in a Lincoln Continental with Licence plates DOC JON.

There have been other suspicious occurrences. One morning I discovered that the contents of an uncapped bottle of diethyl ether had vanished into thin air overnight. All my phone conversations with Joe Clark were recorded. The Canadian dollar is slipping.

The offices of the Varsity are directly across from Fort Book. Lately it has become painfully apparent that the prevailing winds have had a detrimental effect on the quality of the newspaper. This must stop.

With renewed vigour we again call upon Governing Council to take immediate action against this aerodynamic archvillain. If you have any feelings for the health and well-being of the university community, the public at large, and all of humanity, then act now. Down with Fort Book, literally!

Punk and pap two sides of coin

I'm pleased to have initiated a discussion on pop music with my opinion piece on punk rock. Open, lively debate of cultural issues, with Varsity reviewers revealing the assumptions behind their articles, is refreshing. One thing proven by the outraged letters in response is that sides can be taken even over music.

I am disappointed however in the level of debate. Simple name-calling and personal attacks is to be expected though from supporters of a music that degrades people. And what can you say about a critic who answers the charge that punk rock promotes fascist attitudes with the retort that I "ought to be taken out and shot"? Such self-exposure requires no further comment.

After wading through another writer's toilet jokes, I came upon the chestnut that anyone who criticizes punk must be "a crusty old knothole of the entrenched elite" who wants to stomp out anything fun. This "critic's" answer to the fact that punks make racist slurs, parade Nazi symbols, and spit on women is that punk means "anybody can and should get up and do and be all that they can." Rather a limited view of human potential.

Rather than indulge in this trash, I'd like to return the discussion to its original higher level with consideration of two important points raised.

One writer makes a big deal out of some conservative papers being against punk. Ever read the Toronto Sun? The most pornographic, sexist paper in town is always railing for a Yonge St. clean-up of the sex shops. What is at work here is the two-facedness of the rich. On one hand some of them promote absolute garbage as culture and on the other hand some parade as moralists blathering about the decline of morality etc. In many cases it's the same people playing both sides.

Punk gets its widest publicity from media which supposedly carries on against it — knowing that by stressing how "revolutionary" and "anti-establishment" this vomit is, they might co-opt a few genuinely rebellious youth into it. The history of rock is that stars from Elvis Presley to the Beatles to the San Francisco acid rock bands made their millions on the basis of being rebels castigated by the establishment — who also made millions off them. This is now being attempted again for Johnny Rotten and friends. We shouldn't — and I don't think we will — fall for this again.

The second serious misconception is that anyone who opposes punk must be a fan of "Eagles-Dan Hill serio morbidisio pap-rock" or the "rich and soft" Mick Jagger. Don't forget Mick Jagger was billed not so long ago in the same way as a "street-fightin' man" and his band was supposed to be the ultimate in ugliness and bad taste.

Moreover, I agree that most pop stars jam the air waves with pap, rather than culture of any merit. They try to fill your head with meaningless love-and-peace muzak on one hand or with meaningless hate as in punk on the other hand. Again this is nothing new. The fifties gave us both the leather-jacketed Presley and the milkop Pat Boone. The sixties gave us the pseudo-revolutionaries of violent rock and the peace-man-everything-is-beautiful hippie stars. I say they both come down to the same thing: a backward, dying culture that has nothing real to offer you for the future. Both Johnny Rotten and John Denver are just the latest manifestation of this.

So what would a genuine, valuable culture be like?

The first question that has to be answered is "culture for whom?" Should art and literature serve the vast majority of Canadian people or should it serve a handful of the wealthy and powerful? Does punk rock really do anything for youth and students other than divert them into sideline absurdity? Do you think the powerful in this country feel even the slightest threat from punk rock?

In order to create a popular art which serves us, we have to know a bit about the cultural history and traditions of the country in which we live. There is a rich history of spirited, living culture in Canada. This has developed in the course of actual struggles. For example, the Native peoples of Canada have produced music and art forged in the course of their fights against colonialism and denial of their hereditary rights. There is a fine tradition of progressive culture in Quebec developed in the course of the Quebecois struggle for national liberation. The Maritimes, the West Coast, the working class movements, and the immigrant communities have all given rise to indigenous art forms. You won't hear them blasted over the radio or written up in the newspapers to any significant degree. We have to investigate them.

Even then we are not finished. Our purpose is not simply to resurrect old national forms but to choose the best, the most progressive forms and give them bright, new content that reflects social reality while pointing out the way ahead.

Compare this to the inward-turned, rotting pop art that tells us over and over again that everything is hopeless, that we should take up lives of self-contempt, racism, brutality, and pessimism.

It is no coincidence in my view that this three-chords and nothingness can only be defended by its proponents with sick, contemptible, verbal abuse.

The National's newest Schaufuss shows well...

Peter Schaufuss is an intriguing man. Though celebrated to be among the world's top six male ballet dancers as well as The National Ballet of Canada's new principal, Schaufuss is surprisingly modest. Few individuals reach the pinnacle of their profession at 27 years of age and Schaufuss, who has, carries the responsibilities and pressures of success very well. There is a touch of self-concern but no conceit. In between rehearsals for the NBC's fall season he said, "My greatest asset is that I'm totally involved."

A native of Denmark who was educated at the Royal Danish Ballet School, Schaufuss is both an excellent dancer who brings to the National an impressive portfolio as well as a Dane who has retained his purity of being in a world that eagerly makes its stars and blindly seeks to destroy them.

Schaufuss, who was guest artist with the NBC in its 1977 New York season, spent the last three years as a principal with the New York City Ballet which is under the direction of this century's choreographic genius, George Balanchine. The NYCB has few principal dancers but those it employs are of a very high calibre. You might say that they are la creme de la creme.

It is a quality you recognize instantly and in a simple rehearsal of Bayaderka at the O'Keefe Centre last Tuesday, Schaufuss demonstrated that he has it. His elevation was superb and he virtually absorbed the space around him. On stage he became larger than himself and indicated a capacity to become larger than life.

On stage Schaufuss is physically only a fraction smaller because there is a solidity about him that remains as firm as the earth. In comparing the dancer and the man you are left with something of a paradox. The one is expansive and adventurous; the other is reserved and cautious. But always there is the strength.

Schaufuss, who was very conscious of speaking to the press, has eyes that penetrate and question. He speaks slowly, thoughtfully, weighs and selects his words with the most delicate of care.

"I loved the time I spent there," Schaufuss said of the NYCB. "I think it's a fantastic company. Balanchine is a great man, a great personality." Three years at Balanchine's side "gave me a different outlook on dancing. Maybe when I came I was only thinking of technique."

Schaufuss explained that working with Balanchine expanded his understanding of music and taught him taste which, for him means knowing the difference between good and bad choreography.

"I was very happy at the New York City Ballet," he emphasized. "I was learning all the time while I was there." Why, then, did he leave?

Schaufuss had been performing as a guest artist with other major ballet companies including American Ballet Theatre, the Royal Danish Ballet and London Festival Ballet. The offers to dance were steadily increasing and Schaufuss felt that for him to accept on a regular basis, which he ultimately decided that he wanted to do, would infringe on his commitment to the NYCB.

"When you're involved in a very large company like the New York City Ballet it's hard to get time off," said Schaufuss. "I kept getting offers to dance outside and they let me do that but I sort of had to make up my mind whether I wanted to perform all over the world or mainly in New York. I chose to dance everywhere." Then came the decision as to whether he wanted to dance as a freelance or whether he wanted to have a company as a base — the outcome of which is clear.

"I had a choice of four different major companies," he stated. "Out of those four companies The National Ballet of Canada was the one I felt was best for me." Artistically the NBC has a lot of ballets in its largely classical repertoire that Schaufuss wants to dance. The contract that he signed with the company will afford him the freedom to appear as a guest artist elsewhere and another reason for joining the NBC is, he said, "I like everybody in the company."

What you see is what you get.

Tonight at the O'Keefe Schaufuss is dancing with Vanessa Harwood in Erik Bruhn's version of Coppelius. A fellow Dane and member of the preceding generation's master dancers, Bruhn is an old friend of Schaufuss and both danced with the Royal Danish Ballet. Schaufuss said Bruhn influenced him "only at a very early stage" because "he was the only real very great dancer that I had seen." Bruhn, who was a pioneer in leaving Denmark to dance internationally, became an example for Schaufuss to follow. "Then I wanted to go away too."

Like Bruhn, Schaufuss was trained in the Bournonville style which is carefully preserved by the Royal Danish Ballet. Bournonville was one of the Romantic period's most brilliant choreographers and Schaufuss expressed some regret that Bruhn had not set any Bournonville ballets outside of Denmark while he was still dancing. Today the only place you will see a Bournonville ballet is in Copenhagen but it's a situation that Schaufuss personally plans to change.

Kasper spooks this reviewer

Whoever said that "a play is words" must have had Peter Handke's Kasper in mind. Not that Kasper, currently being co-produced by Theatre Passe Muraille and Montreal Theatre Lab at the Cafe Soho, is as simple as that. It is an intriguing exploration into linguistics — a play about words using words, about learning to speak through speech, and about language serving not as a means of expression, but as a tool of manipulation.

Kasper was inspired by an historical incident — the mysterious appearance of a fully grown youth who was isolated from human contact, emerging into society mature physically, but with the perceptual and conceptual faculties of a child. The historical Caspar Hauser, however, bears only an abstract relationship to the central figure of Handke's play who becomes rather the prototype for a linguistic myth. Kasper's initial lack of co-ordination, incoherence and inability to associate object and function is gradually replaced by a fluent, even poetic awareness of language and order as he is indoctrinated by off-stage prompters into an educated, socially acceptable being.

To be more than an empty barrage of political slogans and banal clichés describing order, materialism, and conformity, however, the audience must be confronted with the visual as well as verbal transformation of Kasper. The play must demonstrate the process of indoctrination — a full cycle beginning with incoherence, gradually climaxing with Kasper's total awareness and again degenerating into incoherence with the realization that original thoughts can only be expressed through language, but that the preconceived meanings of language finally preclude originality. By failing to explicitly show the entire transformation of Kasper, the production obscures much of the play's meaning and, worse still, its dramatic strength.

Essentially Kasper is a one man show and Jack Weatherall just doesn't have the finesse to capture and generate the intensity required for the role. Unconvincing, even farcical in the first moments of the play as the unintelligible Kasper vainly struggling to comprehend himself and his environment, Weatherall's performance does gain some momentum throughout the first act, eventually achieving an appealing, fragile and vulnerable quality. The focus of his performance seems to wander however, rather than culminate in a forceful character. He misses the essential Kasper who has learned to control his physical self yet lost control of his soul. Weatherall only dominates the stage when using a microphone near the end as he turns on the audience to indoctrinate us just as the prompters indoctrinated him. The physical power gained is an isolated occurrence not part of a graduated climax. The final collapse becomes an abrupt and puzzling ending rather than a meaningful degeneration — the fulfillment of the process.

The production is salvaged by the imaginative theatrics and staging of the director, Alexander Hausvater. The off-stage indoctrinators who put Kasper (and the audience) through "speech torture" call upon a variety of sources, particularly the sing-song insipidity of educational T.V.'s "language-learning" programs and the mechanized cadence of airport terminal recordings. More than just theatrically exciting, the pleasant, nondescript voices mouthing moral precepts and threatening messages are oppressive because they are immediately recognizable — a disconcerting, insidious thread tying our fate with that of Kasper.

"I would like to reproduce the Bournonville ballets outside of Copenhagen while I'm at my peak, while I'm still dancing. There are so many Bournonville jewels in Denmark. It's a completely different style and one of the few styles in the world which is unique."

Schaufuss' conviction to set the Bournonville ballets is as compelling as he is himself. There was a time when he was frequently confronted with the fact that he is the son of acclaimed character dancer Frank Schaufuss and solo dancer Mona Vangsa but that time has now past. Schaufuss, who is grateful to his parents for the gift they gave him, nonetheless always realized that his roots gave him only the potential to be a truly fine dancer. The onus to fulfil this ambition has always rested on his own shoulders. He pointed out, "I was alone when I went out on stage. I couldn't take my parents out on stage with me."

Dance is Schaufuss' passion. Those who watch him perform, as will tonight's audience, are given a man who is totally devoted to his art. "There is no difference between my private life and my professional life."

Vancouver choir delights without drive

The Music Canada Series at the St. Lawrence Centre, opened Monday evening with the Vancouver Chamber Choir under the direction of Jon Washburn. Despite a gruelling two week tour preceding this performance, the choir delivered their program with conviction and polish, creating a most enjoyable listening experience. Above all, the sixteen performers obviously delighted in singing together, so that they made up in enthusiasm what they occasionally lacked in intensity.

The group of four madrigals by Thomas Morley proved a somewhat weak opener. The magnificent blend the sopranos and tenors have achieved in their individual sections overwhelmed the tentative approach of the two other parts. The altos, in particular, failed to properly motivate their inner part, thus undermining the clarity of the musical structure.

Nottrem's Five Flower Songs benefitted from a much more consistent and cohesive interpretation. The numerous difficulties of these songs were well manoeuvred and the gorgeous closing chord of "The Succession of the Four Sweet Months" was enough to make one weak in the knees. In fact, throughout the program, the superb balancing of static chords was an outstanding feature, making up for some of the less satisfying balance in florid sections.

The Kodaly Matra Pictures started at a disadvantage with its disjointed structure, which even the good efforts of this choir could not overcome. The altos sounded forced and no section convincingly established the connection between songs. However, they recovered themselves in the last Kodaly number, "Stealing Chickens", which was loaded with energy and good humour, thus closing the first half of the program most effectively.

The second part of the evening must have been planned in a spirit of great optimism, since the sustained intensity required for the first two pieces was, as yet, beyond the grasp of this relatively young choir. (They were only formed in 1971). Palestrina's Missa Brevis was uneven, with the Benedictus offering the only exalted musical experience. Otherwise, the Kyrie was muddy, the opening of the Sanctus was sloppy, and the Agnus Dei suffered from a slight tuning problem, due to a tendency to sit on the notes.

The Brahms Motet Op. 29, No. 2

headed a little sharp, but improved steadily until the beautiful closing section. Certainly, it is frustratingly difficult to strike a balance in this motet between its fugal writing, pious text, and lush harmonies without lapsing into an inappropriately romantic interpretation. With greater concentration and more time, this choir could produce a truly memorable performance of this demanding work.

The David Willcocks arrangement of English folksongs was the only real disappointment of the evening. Barbershop quartet scorings are hard to get excited about at the best of times, but following the Palestrina and Brahms, this set was almost insulting. The bass ostinato opening quickly became a mannerism and the writing for sopranos in "Early One Morning" was unsuitable. The altos made a good showing in these songs, however, which was the one saving grace.

Psychological scenario of a fifties fry

A salutary corrosive: the visionary satire of Robert Coover

The popularity of Robert Coover's novel The Public Burning (Viking Press: New York, hardcover, $16.95), currently selling well in paperback, is fully justified considering the merits of the novel itself, which is a masterpiece. It is the best satirical novel to come out of America since Catch-22. But if the success of The Public Burning leads a wider readership to seek out and press for the reissue of some of Coover's earlier works, so much the better.

In the last dozen years, Coover has written and published two novels, a volume of short fiction, and an anthology of plays of various lengths (plus two short novels as yet uncollected). It's a remarkable and original body of work, and so far as The Universal Baseball Association, J. Henry Waugh, Prop. is still being issued in paperback and is on some University courses. All of the others can only be found in hardcover editions tucked away in divers libraries.

His first novel, The Origin of the Brunists, is a savage, impressionistic satire on the founding of a religious cult. The cult grows up in a revivalist church in the mining town of West Condon as the result of a mining disaster in which 97 miners are killed. One of the dead, a lay preacher, has left a cryptic note which the revivalists are certain is a message straight from God to brother Ely, prophesying the end of the world on the eighth of next month. A fervor sweeps the town and much of the countryside round about. The cult is picked up by the media with the able guidance of an amiably cynical journalist, Tiger Miller, once the star athlete of the basketball team and now the owner-publisher-ace reporter of the local newspaper. Key figures in the cult are Abner "Red" Baxter ("Red" because of the color of his hair and because, before becoming a hell-fire and brimstone evangelist, he was Marx-piss and brimstone communist active in union work in the thirties — so dedicatedly Communist that he is widely rumored to have personally executed one or two fellow-miners whom he considered to have an inadequate Marxist analysis) and Eleanor Wylie, a woman who receives gnomic messages from the spirit-world which only she can decipher for her eager followers. These two congenially hate each other, and mutually hate the newspaperman because they see through his feigned belief in his essential cynicism and they both scorn him for an opportunist.

Dozens of people with nothing better to occupy themselves with at the moment congregate to wait for the end of the world with the Brunists (Named for Giovanni Bruno, a miner whose incoherent gabble about seeing a "great white bird" in the mines is taken up by the cult as a vision of God's dove of peace). Their patron saint, Bruno, is a hopeless mental defective to begin with, and after the accident a paralytic vegetable as the result of carbon monoxide poisoning. But the least gesture with his fingers, or what may be interpreted as the least gesture with his fingers, brings profound messages to the cult, proof of his saintliness and authority before God. The white dove of peace emblem sewn on the plain brown robes of the Brunists, is the symbol under which they perform one ritual murder and attempt another on the night the world is supposed to end but does not.

Repression in USA

The various religious frenzies of the Brunists are traced in Coover's novel to the nervous energy generated by several repressions, all typified in the sexual. An example of the explicit use of this theme is in an early scene where Angela Bonali, the highly Catholic daughter of one of the miners is in a car with an unidentified boy who is scrambledly manoeuvring towards consummation as they listen to an Evangelical broadcast on the radio. She begs him to stop at the crucial moment, and he grumbles, but desists. Nevertheless he keeps his hand on her knee for future reference. Then the broadcast is interrupted with news of the mining disaster. Angela gasps in horror, and immediately fears that her father will be taken for her sins: "I'm sorry, daddy!"

More potent still is a little dirty sung late in the book by a mean, warped little small-town weasel who gets together a mob to harass the cultists just for the fun, burn a few crosses, smash a few windows, smash a few heads if we're really lucky y'know, and he sings gaily:

"Jesus loves me, this I know,
Old man Bruno told me so.
Little ones to him belong,
His is short but mine is long."

The Origin of the Brunists is an exemplary piece. A beginning novelist could study it to get great profit because it has most of the virtues and a few of the vices usual in a first novel.

The novel is daring in its mixing of several levels of reality, fantasies, dreams, cabalistic and philosophical musings by the characters being interwoven throughout with more conventional narratives of events. He uses voice very boldly, switching into the rhythms and interior speech-patterns of each of his characters in turn as he glides from one consciousness to another (no easy task without confusing the reader in a novel with somewhere near a hundred characters portrayed using much interior monologue) and this he manages without confounding one voice with another and at the same time, links all of these into a coherent voice of community.

One of the reasons the novel creates a coherence out of episodic materials and a jumble of radically different voices is that he makes very bold connections, often surreal and invariably corrosively ironic, between radically disjunct areas of experience. Sometimes heaped one atop the other like the B-52 bombers humping at the opening of Dr. Strangelove: "Between Andre Kostelanetz and revivalist singing came the news of the disaster at the mine."

It is to Coover's credit also that, although the novel owes much to technical and stylistic resources opened up by such writers as Joyce and Faulkner for instance in the use of multiple narrators and although the novel is in fact umbilically tied to the tradition of satirical writing from Aristophanes to Juvenal to Ben Jonson and Swift, Coover avoids likewise the pitfall frequent in first novels of seeming derivative. He has not simply borrowed but assimilated those techniques other writers have employed which are useful to his novel — his own style and unique vision are uppermost.

The penultimate chapter of the novel has Tiger Miller the newspaper reporter being very nearly martyred in the crotch by the hatchet of Eleanor Wylie leading the frenzied Brunist mob to rend and tear him. The scene contains an extended reference to the climactic scene of mob violence in Hollywood in Day of the Locust; but Coover gives no sense of leaning on that scene for support in convincing his own — rather he has assimilated the extended allusion to it, and to the crucifixion of Christ (here profanely repeated in the attempted dismemberment of Tiger) to his own uses. There is an allusion to Aristophanes in a nightmare of one of the miners in which he relives the collapse of the mines, but sees it happening this time because one of the dead miners had devastated the support shafts with an erection that grows to over fifty feet long.

Shocking Conceit

Being Coover, Pricksongs and Escants (a collection of his short stories) contains some brilliant and electric juxtapositions (such as a beach bum on an Island in "The Magic Poker" who wanders about a deserted room, finds a teapot of fine China only slightly damaged, and shits in it, which leads to a marvelous mock-philosophical monologue in which the author is disgusted and alarmed with himself for coming up with such a shocking conceit), brilliant characterizations, hilarious dialogue and interior monologue, but it also has (especially in a long "Prologue" addressed to Miguel de Cervantes introducing "Seven Exemplary Stories") some of the worst writing in Coover ever to combine pretentiousness and queasy allusiveness with obscurity of thought and opacity of diction. Not a story in the lot isn't brave and original in conception and only a handful are as good as they must be if they are to live up to their original idea. Experiments. "A Pedestrian Accident" is almost a great story but ends up being much less than that because Coover lets the ending dissolve — he isn't strong enough there to realize the impact of the tragic-comic fate of a pedestrian who is run over by a truck marked "Kiss-Proof Lipstick" and left to die whilst a carnival springs up about him. "Gingerbread House" is about Hansel and Gretel and will appeal to readers of Donald Barthelme's Snow White but the Brothers Grimm did it better. "The Elevator" is nice, it has a great passage in which one man verbally humiliates the sex of another, in front of his co-workers in the elevator of a high-rise office. The great story in the collection was "Panel Game", in which a contestant on a game show is hung when he is unable to come up with the right answer. The only work I can think to compare this masterful story with is "Atrocity Bluff".

The Universal Baseball Association, J. Henry Waugh, Prop., is about a man who has invented a baseball game involving three colored dice and eight imaginary teams which compose a league. He often loses himself in fantasy and so the novel takes place as much in the league itself, seen through the eyes and minds of the players, as it does in the real world where J. Henry Waugh works as an accountant. By the end of the novel we are entirely in the fantasy world of the league, one thousand years in the future. J. Henry Waugh has disappeared forever.

I don't think The Universal Baseball Association is as good a novel as The Origin of the Brunists; for one thing it is scarcely 200 pages long, but seems overwritten. He goes on too long with the subjective impressions of his characters. Some of the writing is plain maudlin: "The game? Life? Could you separate them?" (which makes vastly too obvious the novel's central metaphor).

A Theological Position is a collection of six plays by Coover; I'm not familiar enough with them to make any comment here.

The Cat in the Hat

Coover also has published in American Review two memorable short novels. The first, The Cat in the Hat for President, is about a campaign by one of the two major political parties to run Dr. Seuss' character as a candidate. It's a brilliant novel, with some of the wildest fantasy evocations of politics I've ever read; there's a great scene where the Cat in the Hat's opponent is giving a speech which he concludes reverentially with Lincoln's catchphrase "government of the people, by the people, for the people;" the Cat-in-the-Hat replies with an absurdist catalogue: "Government through the people, beside the people, against the people, around the people," concluding with "government UP the people." And one of the great great scenes in Coover is the one where the Cat in the Hat comes riding into the convention floor balancing on his nose a cake on a rake and a coat on a boat (etc.) up to a fish in a fishbowl howling, "I do not like this, not one bit!!". The whole works spill, the convention hall is flooded as the bowl grows to enormous size and the fish, likewise grown, swallows the convention. Inside, everybody is bewildered and terrified; the narrator, Brown, finds himself stroking the flank of one of the Cat in the Hat's campaign girls, a catkin, who says to him in awe: "Maybe he's Jesus."

The other short novel published in American Review is the remarkable Whatever Happened to Gloomy Gus of the Chicago Bears, about a football player who masters the game (and the seduction of women) by working out everything concerned with football playing and fucking to a finite, easily manipulable series of moves. His technique is so refined that he is able to win the big game at college by 12 touchdowns, and within thirty seconds thereafter screw one of the cheerleaders. Eventually his mechanistic style of play is his downfall, because the opposition just memorizes his moves and counters them, and he begins to run into difficulty when he has to work up new and complex manoeuvres. But he is still extraordinarily successful with women, although a woman he has had complaints to the narrator that he never talks to her except to say "Come here, I've been looking for you." He dies in a protest rally when a policeman throws a gas grenade and reflexively he picks it up and hurls it back at the police and is shot dead by them. One of the officers, when informed he has just killed Gloomy Gus of the Chicago Bears, says, "I don't know about that. I follow baseball."

This Isn't Libelous

The Public Burning, according to Ken Adachi of the Star, changed publishers several times because the companies feared libel. Now why any publisher would worry about libel suits in connection with a novel whose main character, Richard Nixon, appears in Times Square where all the world is gathered to watch the burning of Julius and Ethel Rosenberg, with his pants down about his knees and the words "I am a scamp" lipsticked on his bottom and proceeds to make a political speech; in which the six supreme court justices who overturned Justice Douglas' stay of execution wallow in elephant shit; in which Everett Dirksen tells a joke about the Rosenbergs: "They're taking the fifth. Only the way they say it is 'I refuse to testify on the grounds that it may tend to incinerate me'; or the climactic scene in which Nixon first chases Pat around like a dog in order to beg her forgiveness for having made such a turkey of himself at the rally (and being found with a message written in a strange woman's lipstick on his ass), is then bugged on the floor by Uncle Sam, and afterwards confesses timorously (still feeling the pain) "Uncle Sam, I love you!" Why any publisher should be afraid to publish that, as I say, is beyond me. (Although in all fairness to Nixon, I feel he should be given a fair chance to respond in the courts, and so I would like to propose a collection amongst the readers of the Varg, to go towards buying a copy of the novel to send to Nixon in his seclusion in San Clemente — with key passages lipsticked for easy reference — in case he is unaware of what people are saying about him.)

The Public Burning is a great satirical novel, Coover's finest to date and the one in which he refines to near-perfection the techniques he has been honing throughout his writing career. Above all in his writings there has been the preoccupation with the fantasy that lies just beneath the surface reality of an event, and inspires, even impels events in what we call the real world. This has given his writing at best a quality at once surreal and almost documentary as in the limerick from "Panel Game":

*There once was a young belly dancer
Who thought that her art was the answer
Till she made a slip
And fractured her hip
And perished grotesquely of cancer.*

Satirists often see themselves as doctors tending a sick society, and the fantasies Coover uncovers are for the most part, fearfully sick ones.

In The Public Burning Coover has so intensified this method that at all points in the novel the reality, the brutal documentary reality, and the fantasy that motivates and guides it to its end, are simultaneous. When Irving Saypol appears in the courtroom to try the Rosenbergs, carrying in his head the recent statistics from Korea, the courtroom is partly transformed by the power of the mental image into a strip of the battlefield in Korea: This, however, is the most critical case in Irving Saypol's career. American casualties in Korea are approaching the hundred thousand mark when he rises, tall, hard and graying, to make his opening statement. There are fears of imminent war everywhere in Europe. He suffers his thick sheaf of papers, smooths down the pocket flap of his double-breasted suit jacket. Irving Saypol is a sonovabitch at gin rummy, but does he hold the cards?

This meshing of fantasy and reality gives an awesome power to the book. It makes nightmares happen on the streets, on the trains, in Times Square, they become wild collages of brutal reality and even more brutal metaphorical and symbolic fantasy. The effect is not unlike The Temptations of St. Anthony by Grunewald, a painting in which perspective is deliberately wiped out and St. Anthony is seen in the midst of a vortex of monstrous creatures overlaid one on top of the other in claustrophobic inseparation. That is the effect the novel has for example when Nixon gets on board the Look Ahead, Neighbor special to ride to Times Square. There the death chair is being set up to fry the Rosenbergs amidst a neon-and-incandescent circus lit and emceed by Uncle Sam. Nixon ends up riding to Sing Sing to try and persuade Ethel Rosenberg to save herself — he has fallen in love with her autobiographical sheet — and ends up trying to fuck her twenty minutes before they come to lead her off. We see boozing and carousing and men and women feeling each other up in public, and letters pasted up on the windows of the train. The letters are documentary again, they are literal letters written by average Americans to express their sentiments in the death of the Rosenbergs, and yet who would not believe they are part of some morbid and grotesque fantasy? A sample, Maestro, if you please: Build a strong wailing wall with four sides, and put dear little Mammala and Papala Rosenberg in the big middle of this wailing wall in Sing Sing, and let them wail and wail and wail. What do the Jews do in return (for being) permitted to live in the U.S.? He is without exception the spy, the saboteur, "Commies", Left Wingers, Infiltrators, hate mongers and all around trouble makers, to say nothing of their intense Zionism which makes Hitler look like an amateur. These 2 Rats should of been hung long ago & so should you.

A good American.

Psychological Reality

Whew! Of course the letter is an improbable and grotesque fantasy but it exists in the head of the letter-writer himself. It is passages like these that vindicate Coover's thesis and his method: the literal documentary details of the Rosenberg case suggest that the only way to properly document it is to make plain the psychological reality behind the public burning of Julius and Ethel Rosenberg through recreating their death vividly as a wild fantasy scenario, a combination opera, three-d movie, Disney special, De Mille epic (Disney has a Mickey Mouse booth in the fairground at Times Square on the night of the Rosenbergs' execution; De Mille orchestrates the movement of the crowds), psychological morality play with Melville's white whale reappearing as the whale in "Pinocchio" to swallow protestors (only touch missing is to put Mayor Daley's face on the side), comic book with a superhero, Uncle Sam, and a supervillain, The Phantom (named presumably after Marx's observation, "A specter is haunting Europe"), opera and soap opera (with the idealism and devotion to one another of the Rosenbergs contrasted with the venality of the Eisenhower administration), comedy show with Jack Benny and Bob Hope and an anarchic recreation of the execution by the Marx brothers as pre-switch entertainment, variety hour with Presidents, senators and all the mythic figures of American history passing by on parade like extras in Busby Berkeley, and more, more yet.

For in overlaying literal, symbolic, metaphorical and psychological perspectives, Coover also overlays technique upon technique, style upon style in a stunning virtuoso performance that scarcely lets up through five hundred thirty-four pages horrific, comic, appalling, demonic, wildly compelling image, narrative, dialogue — I'll tell you something, Coover's got the whole fucking shooting match in this one, fans, and no error. You read this book when you're ready to grab both ends of an electrical wire and jolt yourself silly. Catch-22 was the great American satirical novel of the sixties; The Public Burning is likely to be it for the seventies, and by Jesus, it's better than Catch-22. It's less diffused, more focussed in its assault, vastly less overwritten, richer in texture, technique, and novelistic gift, and (trust me) funnier.

Nixon is speaking with his pants down to a multitude in Times Square: "I would suggest that under the circumstances, everybody here tonight should come before the American people and bare himself as I have done! . . . I want to make my position perfectly clear! We have nothing to hide! And we have a lot to be proud of! We say that no one of the 167 million Americans is a little man! The only question is whether we have the faith, the patriotism, the willingness to lead in this critical period! . . . It is a great goal! And to achieve it, I am asking everyone tonight to step forward — right now! — and drop his pants for America!" "IT'S A SHOWDOWN!" they cried. "PANTS DOWN FOR GOD AND COUNTRY!" "PANTS DOWN FOR JESUS CHRIST!" "WHOOPEE!" "FOR THE COMMON MAN!" "DEEDS NOT WORDS!" "PANTS DOWN FOR DICK!"

It was spreading now, spreading fast, some of those larger-than-life cowboys were dropping their chaps, the Pilgrims, Riverboat Gamblers, and Doughboys, governors and judges, secretaries and bureaucrats, and on out into the masses beyond: I saw old Joe Kennedy's pants come down in a twinkling, Herbert Philbrick's too, Yehudi Menuhin's and Hopalong Cassidy's, Rocky Marciano's, Sumner Pike's — and it was even catching on among some of the left-wing radicals — Humphrey Bogart, Dean Acheson, Walter Lippmann and Herbert Lehman, Ralph Bunche, John L. Lewis — the din of crashing belt buckles and ripping zips was deafening! And women as well — Elsa Maxwell, Teresa Wright, Bess Truman, all the ladies in the Mormon Tabernacle Choir — all hiking their skirts and pulling down their drawers, corsets, girdles, whatever they had up there! A few of the more fastidious types were pulling their pants all the way off, but most of them just left them in a heap around their feet, staggering about in tight little circles to cheer the others on and see what their neighbors had.

Why is this man shown only from the waist up? Find out in our exciting review.

Two turning tutus tango

The Turning Point (which opened last night at The Cinema, in the T.D. centre) is an attempt to make us understand the nature of dance and the problems it poses to those who find themselves caught up in a passion from which there is no escape. The story is about two women, both dancers, one of whom chose to devote her life to the art (Emma), the other who chooses to give up dance for domesticity (Deedee). As the film begins we watch the family life of Deedee, the 38 year old housewife with three lovely children who teaches dance on the side. She and her family are going to watch the American Ballet Company, the company to which Deedee and her husband used to belong, perform. Following the performance the reunion with the dancers, especially with Emma (Anne Bancroft) seems to spark an overwhelming sense of nostalgia, jealousy and regret in Deedee (Shirley MacLaine). She begins to doubt overtly her "happy" life. Deedee's envy for Emma's success is exemplified in a particularly acute conversation between the two which serves as an outline for their lives, lives which run parallel (until the turning point:

Deedee: "You got the lead role"
Emma: "You got pregnant"
Deedee: "You got nineteen curtain calls"

Emma: "You got three children"
To further complicate the situation, Deedee's eldest daughter, Emelia, has been accepted into the Company and decides to go to New York to study, accompanied by her mother. Although we see only pieces of the life Emelia leads, we relive through Deedee's eyes the excitement and passion involved in being a dancer. The conflict between Emma and Deedee intensifies as Emma becomes the patron of Emelia, who then turns to her for advice instead of her mother. Deedee's failure to "make it" as an artist irritates her even more as she fails as mother to gain the confidence of her artistic daughter. Emma has clearly become the symbol of all that Deedee is not, although Emma's life as performing artist is now almost over with the door to marriage already closed.

There is a brilliant scene in which Deedee and Emma find themselves sitting at a bar, both having been rejected by their perspective worlds. However the ensuing scratch-and-tear fight is resolved in the admission of mutual jealousies, one past, one present and the final recognition of respect.

To explain all the subtleties of the various scenes would be as difficult as the choreography of each of the dances we are shown. The Turning Point gives us an excellent insight into the "world of dance" and the filming of the dancers of the American Ballet Theatre is superb. The delicate balance of emotion (infatuation?) between Yuri (Mikhail Baryshnikov) and Emelia is mirrored in the excellent performance of both. The energy of Baryshnikov lends an even greater vitality to the film as well as to the reality of the dance world.

The turning point in Deedee's life had been one of deciding to leave the company to raise a family—one of those fatal choices with which one has to live forever after. The unenvying aspect of this particular choice is that, while it is clear to us that Deedee needs both the security of her family and the artistic fulfilment she had known as a performer, to have both would be impossible. Thus the turning point in Deedee's life is a crucial one: if she cannot accept her decision as the right one, then the dismissed alternative of an artistic career will always be there to haunt her, to remind her of what she could have been. We watch as this last possibility succeeds in tearing her apart, and we share her feeling that she really could have been as great a dancer as Emma. The very idea that one might have chosen the wrong direction frightens us as well, for we share in this very basic human dilemma.

Furthermore, the outstanding filming of several dance scenes entrances us and leads to empathize with Deedee's position. An artistic passion such as dance can never be forgotten or dismissed. The final scene shows us the stage with Emma and Deedee, both now ex-dancers, looking out into the empty theatre while Emelia, center stage, is still dancing.

Arrau speaks for himself

I had hoped to end forever the Varsity's purveyance of vintage classical reviews, but one can talk for weeks about pianist Claudio Arrau's Massey Hall recital last Thursday, his first here since Toronto began to fancy itself a big city. The program consisted of Beethoven's Op. 109 Sonata, Liszt's Sonata in B minor, and Brahms's Sonata in F minor, Op. 5.

Arrau has been counted among the world's best pianists for many years. What most impresses me about him is the sound whipping he gives the notion that an ordered presentation of musical materials is incompatible or at least never coincident with an intimate and poetical style. He never overlooks the possibilities of a musical moment, or neglects to find a place for the moment in his interpretive scheme. Nevertheless Arrau's playing springs from the heart; his eloquence is emotive rather than abstract.

It is also personal rather than vatic. Arrau never creates the illusion of a supernatural communion with the composer; it is always his own personality and confidence we hear at work (this may account for his reputation as a cool cucumber). He has the expressive equipment, too: a steadfast technique, an even, powerful tone, and an unerring instinct for balance.

Arrau's most interesting ideas about Beethoven's Op. 109 emerged during the set of variations which ends the sonata. He never disregarded Beethoven's dynamics and phrase markings, but experimented very freely in the passages without extensive guidance, often modifying his rhythmic flow with syncopated emphasis. This technique worked against the music in the first variation, whose fluid melody was continually kicked in the pants by the third beat of the waltz accompaniment. The final variation, however, had great depth of feeling, and Arrau performed the onerous trills with remarkable clarity.

His Liszt B minor was more consistently interesting. Rhythmic innovation again loomed large: Arrau chose to play every occurrence of the second theme (the one Faustians associate with Mephistopheles) much faster than the bar lines normally permit. One particularly impressive feature of the performance was the brilliant contrast he captured during the passage that juxtaposes the "grandiose" theme in fff staccato chords and a quiet recitative based on the first theme.

It's an odd thing to give the black sheep the most unqualified praise, but Arrau made a better pitch for Brahms's early F minor Sonata than I thought possible. The first movement's uncommonly broad spacings sounded neither poorly balanced nor troublesome, and Arrau very successfully compensated for the young Brahms's overly episodic approach to sonata form with a serious, military emotional drive. The Andante espressivo, perhaps the most moving study of the evening, again showed Arrau's power to evoke tenderness through clear and precise accompaniments as well as broadly sustained melodies.

Canada now has its own 'Nashville Lady'. Except for the fact that Colleen Peterson hails from the Ottawa Valley, the southern drawl in her versatile voice could be authentic. That southern affectation is an honest one. Colleen, after spending considerable time on tour in the Southern States, says she almost considers them her second home, that locale and its music milieu has exerted its influence on her style.

In 1968 the Canadian magazine, RPM recognized Peterson's talent by naming her 'most promising female vocalist'. But how is it that it has taken her almost ten years to fulfill that potential?

Colleen says that it is because she "has been looking for one direction to pursue — I can sing all types of music, but now I think I've found it in country music." She tried hard to prove it Tuesday night at the Horseshoe Tavern, and in all fairness it was a decent effort.

Nervous tension inhibited her first few numbers, and the pressure of a stubbornly out-of-tune 'E' string threatened her rather fragile composure. It wasn't to last however. When she swung into what she does best, country-blues-rock, she began to feel her confidence returning, and her audience, at first skeptical of her talents, slowly began to respond.

Despite her 12 years in the business the name 'Colleen Peterson' tends to meet with a blank stare. Not many people seem to know exactly who she is. Yet her songs, such as 'Souvenirs' and 'Don't it Make You Wanna Dance' are familiar, and it was not long before tapping feet replaced the vague looks.

The Horseshoe audience is a restless one. The room is a forest of too many, too small pedestal tables and Peterson had strong competition from the beer glass and bottle rattling percussion section. This was especially noticeable in her blues numbers, unfortunately too quiet, too subdued for such an atmosphere. She was astute enough to recognize this and kept these versions to a minimum, concentrating more on lively 'beer drinking' country rock sounds.

Truckstop Desdemona

The plot of Othello was not new with Shakespeare, and yet the play is unmistakably and entirely his own. The story was only so much timber. Ken Mitchell's Cruel Tears opened Tuesday night at the Bathurst Street Theatre. The success of the production is limited if not prohibited by that same plot, that of passion, deception and revenge. What holds up the Elizabethan masterpiece, only weighs down the drama of the Saskatchewan truckdrivers. It is a structure wholly imposed from without rather than a foundation upon which the drama can be built. The production, billed as a "country musical" is on its last leg of a national tour. It is not the kind of show touring can pull together. The fundamental error is rooted in the play's conception.

Cruel Tears was ostensibly meant to celebrate the joy and pain of the prairie truckdrivers and their wives. As soon, however, as the prototypes from Othello become identifiable and the handkerchief makes its debut in the disguise of a Ukrainian silk shawl, any interest in the characters for their own sake dissolves. That passion, jealousy, revenge and remorse belong as much to the lyrics of country music and the lingo of truckdrivers as they do to Shakespeare no one disputes. But these emotions must be interpreted through their native setting, re-worked by their own characters. Cruel Tears makes the same mistake as do much earlier Canadian dramatic efforts in which the story of the Ukrainian Indian was depicted in terms hopelessly European.

An opera Cruel Tears is not. Humphrey and the Dumptrucks are on stage throughout and provide a great deal of fine country music. Unfortunately, only a few of the actors have enough power to sing country in such a way so as to break through the sophistication of a Toronto audience. Janet Wright, as the disgruntled wife of the 'Iago' trucker comes closer than the rest of the cast in tugging the heart strings. To director Brian Richmond's credit, the onstage musicians were neatly blended in with the stage action, but their function was hardly consistent. Occasionally someone in the band might quietly parody the sentiment out front. It was a nice touch, making the whole thing a little easier to swallow. By the third act, the drama, supposedly gripping enough by this point to carry its own weight, was allowed to forge ahead on its own. The parody was sorely missed.

Cruel Tears told a "tragic" story intermittently sprinkled with lewd jokes and sight gags. Just as the humour did nothing to heighten the poignancy of the drama, so the use of mime was poorly reconciled to any visual and stylistic continuity. The white faced duo (played by Lisa Tronial and Andrew Czaplewski) who became alternately doors, gas pumps, wash stands, and refrigerators on demand, had a great act but it belonged in another show. Surely the director must have seen that they would continuously upstage the strange realism of the main action. If this indeed was the desired effect then any vestige of respect for the aesthetic behind Cruel Tears must be shelved.

Erik Bruhn behind the mask of legend

Erik Bruhn, whose work both as a choreographer and dancer with The National Ballet of Canada is being honoured in the company's fall season, has achieved international acclaim throughout his career for his courageous sense of personal humility. Lauded at the age of nineteen as the greatest dancer in Denmark and at twenty-six esteemed among the greatest in the world, Bruhn has always strived to originate rather than to imitate. Clive Barnes has written in the New York Times that he "is a performer of personal passion." Yet, the master artist's quiet courage of his convictions has sufficed any need for public adulation. He is his own "human being" first.

There is something about me that goes back to when I was very young and my mother was looking for me at the corner and she didn't see me when I was looking right at her only two feet away. . . It made me feel like I was a see-through person. Also, after performances like at the Paris Opera in 1964 when the entire backstage area was crowded — I thought, well, I could push myself through the crowd because they weren't waiting for me and nobody would stop me. I almost got out and a little old lady asked me who I was and after I had told her she said it was me who they were waiting for. They looked at me like they couldn't believe it. I think I'm a very private person offstage. And people insist that they could never mistake me, but that's only after they have known me a long while. . .

My main ambition has always been to become more of a human being first, and secondly, a dancer. I believe, sincerely, that a better dancer can only come through being a better human being. I do not, myself, feel a great need to be recognized. It gives me great relief not to have to play a role offstage. . .

Erik Bruhn's early days as a student of the male orientated Bournonville tradition in Denmark were filled with restlessness and feelings of insecurity. Consequently, today Bruhn encourages freedom of individual expression among his students which he was unable to indulge in himself until he arrived in North America and danced several seasons with the American Ballet Theatre. Moreover, he incorporates his technical prowess with an ability to understand. Bruhn is not so much a perfectionist as a dreamer. "I think I am the kind of person who would be put to a really hard task to accept reality unless I could maintain some kind of dream." He inspires by example. Bruhn is the epitome of the professional with a conscience. "I eliminate any early impression or memory of an earlier performance in order to start fresh like I didn't know the ballet," he mused. Clive Barnes has noted that "there never was a performance when anyone could say: 'Ah, but you should have seen Erik Bruhn when . . .'" Bruhn is always at his best. His quiet concern for his students at the National Ballet School where he is frequently a guest teacher became rapidly obvious as he nervously twisted bits of foil from his cigarette package. You could see why he would be a popular teacher.

In mime classes at fifteen I was the worst pupil of all. There was a great teacher and most of the kids of my generation were pretty good and some were excellent. However, nothing became of many of them because we were simply imitating something. Nothing was ever taken out of you. They just said do this and we did it. I learned a great lesson. I suffered a great deal by myself because when you were a fiasco once, you were a fiasco always and no one would support you. But now I take that into consideration when I am working with younger people. I've tried to give them the essence, the form, the steps but then I try to dig out of themselves what that character one day should be. Maybe there is very little in the beginning but there is always something in you. I was only taught to copy someone else. . . . Yet, I was determined to be myself, good or bad. When I work with young people I say it's for you to become everything and more of you, good or bad, to fulfill yourself.

In 1971, at the age of forty-three Bruhn was forced to retire from dancing for three years because of an illness from which he is now fully recovered. It was an important time in his life. It made him a greater artist because it bestowed upon him a greater sense of humility. It was a time which added colour both to his life and to his performances. Consequently, when Erik Bruhn steps out on the O'Keefe stage tomorrow night as Dr. Coppélius in his own production of Coppelia, it will not be the standard characterization of Dr. Coppélius as the embodiment of evil and bitterness which greets the audience but a pathetic character demanding sympathy. Erik Bruhn has coloured his performance with the pain and joy of his own life experience.

Since my operation three years ago many things have changed physically and mentally. I was sick slowly over ten years and to overcome that in front of the public was one thing, sometimes I couldn't and cancelled, and then not wanting to show it in front of your friends was something else. I thought it was a kind of a death. I used to say pain because pain is also a sign of life. I thought, somehow, I was dying. As I felt it in my body it also effected my mind. The total change came about when finally I found that something was wrong. I wasn't the dreadful thing I thought it was. It wasn't just me alone. . . . It was my subconscious nervous system which they have now discovered can be as powerful as your logical mind. Suddenly it all made sense. It cleared my whole attitude. I wasn't just a sick or whatever. So it was a big change. . . . I think perhaps my illness was a good thing because it made me stop thinking that I had stopped dancing. I only stopped because I was sick and the pain occupied my mind so much I couldn't think of dancing.

Two years later I was long enough away from dancing to realize that I was well again. So, when I danced Jean in Miss Julie in a gala performance for the American Ballet Theatre, I knew I was well. It gave me great satisfaction and an opportunity to give a proper farewell to that classical repertoire. . . . Being out and away from the dance during that time I made friends who I just would not lose by just being on the stage all the time. I want to cultivate whatever kind of human being I am. Thanks to that time out I came back to the stage with more life.

In The Importance of Being Earnest, Oscar Wilde described one of his more formidable characters as being "a monster without being a myth." Erik Bruhn, an equally formidable character himself, is completely the reverse. He is a living legend who is courageous enough to be a human being first. He permits his audience the privilege of peering at the man behind the mask.

Tonight at 8 p.m. The National Ballet of Canada's new principal dancer, an international artist in his own right, Peter Schaufuss is Franz to Vanessa Harwood's Swanilda in Erik Bruhn's version of Coppelia classical ballet's great comic love affair. Constantin Patsalas is Dr. Coppélius. Tomorrow at 2 p.m. Clinton Rothwell partners Harwood while Jacques Gorrissen portrays the old genius doctor. At 8 p.m. Bruhn plays Coppélius himself — it's real the performance to see if you missed him Thurs. night. Mary Jago and Tomas Schramek are the two lovers.

Sunday at 8 p.m. offers a mixed program: Bayaderka (Act IV), Mad Shadows and Collective Symphony. Next Wednesday at 8 p.m. the same program is featured with different dancers, as is the case Thursday at 8 p.m. In total you've a choice of Frank Augustyn, Mary Jago, Karen Kain, Peter Schaufuss, Tomas Schramek and Nadia Potts: more often than not you will see a few of them on stage the same evening in different works. Jago and Kain are sharing Collective Symphony as well as Mad Shadows and Bayaderka. Coming up next weekend is another mixed bag: Afternoon of a Faun, Monodes II and La Sylphide. Don't think that if Kain and Augustyn aren't dancing you won't enjoy a work — that's taking admiration and respect too far. For tickets and info call the O'Keefe Box Office at 363-6633.

Tomorrow night at Harbourfront: There's an Hispano-American Media Dance. Translated it means an evening of Latin American bands and the Folklore Dancers. The Brigantine Room is where it happens. $5. Meanwhile, the Cafe hosts Ballroom dancing. It is free and instruction is available for beginners. For info: 364-5665.

Next Thurs. through Sat. Classical Indian dancer Rana Singha performs at 15 Dance Laboratorium, 155a George St. 8:30 p.m. $3. Reservations are necessary because the place only seats about 40. Call: 869-1589.

The Roxy has monsters with Orcs and King Kong. They'll both be staying till Sunday. The Revue has a five day run of Jonas Who Will Be 25 in the Year 2000. The Three Schools' Hitchcock series continues with Number Seventeen (1932).

Saturday: The New Yorker has a triple bill: Monty Python and the Holy Grail, Fearless Vampire Killers, and Frankenstein. Everyone else repeats.

Sunday: Innis has its Cartoon Program at 2:00, followed by Harold Lloyd's World of Comedy at 5:00 and Garbo in Grand Hotel at 8:00. The AGO's French Film Series continues with Toni, while the New Yorker is screening The Holy Mountain and Fantastic Plants. The Science Centre's opera series has Aida.

Monday: Lumiere has an Ernest Lubitsch night with The Ship Around the Corner and Ninotchka. The program repeats on Tuesday. The New Yorker has Visconti's Death in Venice and his last film Conversation Piece. The Science Centre has four French shorts: Le Diable Probablement, Les Anges du Pêche, Juliette et l'air du Temps, and Casque d'Or. The Roxy Screens Dr. Strangelove and The Front.

Tuesday: Everyone repeats except the New Yorker which serves up Pink Flamingos and Warhol's Bad.

Wednesday: Innis, this time under the auspices of Cinema Beach shows two Charlie Chaplins: The Great Dictator and Limelight. The Science Centre continues in French with Un Type Comme Moi and Devalait. Jamala Mourir and The Wages of Fear. The New Yorker, The Revue, and Cinema Lumiere have Recorded Telephone Messages.

Thursday: The Science Centre offers Les Enfants du Placard and Le Crime de M. Lange.

High Realism is for sale today at the Yaneff International Gallery, from 5:30 till 9:30 in George McLean's first major Canadian exhibition of paintings. Interior decorators with smaller budgets should head to Gallery Pascal or the Mira Godard Gallery for affordable posters. The Innuit Gallery of Eskimo Art opens a show tomorrow of miniature wall hangings to warm the barest igloo walls. Till Dec. 3.

If you didn't have a government job this summer, then here are some suggestions for just looking. Kim Ondaatje, A Canadian poet with a nondescript cult following, has expanded to acrylic paintings, silkscreen and quilting in a multimedia exhibition at the Scarborough College Art Gallery. Till Dec. 5. Erindale continues the Victoria's World show of pictures from Victorian England. Till Nov. 27.

The AGO opens a show next Friday called The Laurentians: Painters in a Landscape combining works by Holgate, Riopelle, Goodridge Roberts, de Tonnancour and others. The colour poster for the show is probably its best attribute. Selected Canadian Paintings from Collections in the University of Toronto continues to draw crowds and will till Nov. 20. By far the best show in town is still Impresario-Ambroise Vollard at the AGO till Dec. 4. Cezanne, Bonnard, Picasso, C hagall all feature as clients of this entrepreneur, the foremost art dealer and publisher of the early 20th century Paris art world. Also showing are the drawings of Henry Moore till the New Year, major paintings by Gerald Ferguson, a Halifax painter and experimental artist, and photos by James Klotz.

David Mirvish Gallery has recent, not-so-good paintings by Daniel Soloman, till Nov. 29. Dutch painter, Karel Appel, from the post war COBRA group has an appealing show at Gallery Moos and a knowledge of abstract expressionism isn't necessary to appreciate it. Till Nov. 24.

British watercolours from the period between 1730 and 1880 are featured at the National Gallery in Ottawa and include romantic favourites such as Turner, Blake and Cozens. Be there before Dec. 11.

Contemporary Ontario Glass is an excellent show at the Pottery Shop on Avenue Road. This gallery-shop has proved consistently worthwhile for shows and affordable ceramics. Richard Sowell's hand-pulled prints at the Albert White Gallery should be seen for technique, not originality. Till Nov. 23. Nearby, at the Gadatsy Gallery, Peter Flinisch's Around the Body drawings aren't hand-pulled, but hand picked — very worthwhile.

On campus, the paintings of r.f.a. McInnis are fine examples of expressive realism. Till Dec. 2. Off campus be sure to visit Artisan 77, an exhibit and sale of Japanese arts and crafts.

And...the moment you've all been waiting for...an exhibition of the paintings of controversial artist Harold Klunder at the Sable-Castelli Gallery. It opens Monday and it's angry.

theatre

Yes, the Varsity is irrelevant.

Even so, we would appreciate it if we were wooed as assiduously by campus theatre groups as we are by the professionals who want to use our listing service. Even if you don't know until the last minute, surely you can send us notice of your upcoming productions? It is distressing to see posters sprout three days before a campus production and then have multitudinous complaints from the public that we don't list campus shows by choice. We do, too. Whenever we hear about them. You have been warned.

This week, then, on campus: at the Studio Theatre, Glen Morris St., Barker Fairley's translation of Faust lumbers Gothic into that dim night; tonight and tomorrow at 8:30, call 978-8705 for reservations, admission free. At the U.C. Playhouse, 79a St. George St., tonight only, Cafe-Theatre, admission $1.50 includes a drink; a project for the francophones amongst us. 8:00 p.m., tickets at the door. In the same space beginning next Wednesday, a play by Brecht. Call 978-6703, reservations required but admission free. At Cartwright Hall, St. Hilda's, the TCDS presents Shaw's Arms and the Man, 8:15 tonight and tomorrow night, admission $1.

Victoria College's annual Bob Review arrives this week; shows tonight and tomorrow in Rm. 3, New Academic Building, curtain 8:30, admission 50 cents and $1.50. At Erindale, Miss Julie presented at the Studio Theatre next Thursday to Saturday at 8:30, a special Friday performance at 2:10. Tickets $2 or $1.50 for Erindalians (such discrimination — la! — tickets should be reserved by calling 828-5349. The Dismal continues at Hart House, tickets $3 for students any night. At New College, by hearsay only, Neil Simon's God's Favorite tonight and tomorrow night. Is the message coming through?

Last chances for a number of good plays. Tarragon's The Dream Play, a superb condensation of Strindberg's script presented with masks closes this weekend, call 531-1827. Also closing out is Les Canadiens at Toronto Workshop; call 925-8640.

Openings this week and next: at the Bathurst Street Theatre, Cruel Tears, 536-6663, show time 8:30; at the Etobicoke Public Library, Tuesday evening at 8:00, Caribbean Pepperpot, a free entertainment of drama, dance and poetry of the West Indies; call 248-5681 for more information. For more Caribbean entertainment, this Sunday beginning at noon Harbourfront presents Fiesta Caribay, a presentation of Black Theatre Canada. As well as live and recorded music, at 6:00 A Few Things About Us will be performed. 235 Queen's Quay W., again free.

Last call for campus theatre: Borders, Boundaries and Thresholds, a production generated by Eileen Thalenberg, at the Benson Building tomorrow night and Sunday 8:30 admission, $3; a programme involving thirty-five dancers, two majorettes, as well as musicians? Interesting.

Hello Jazz Fans! Opinions continue to pur in about Frank Rosolino's trombone playing. One prominent Toronto jazz musician (my Uncle Marvin) asserts that a single burp by Rosolino swings more than a dozen Chuck Mangione solos.

BB King, father of the blues, has profoundly influenced rock and jazz guitarists for years, among them Eric Clapton. King plays at the Colonial next week for the fee of $5.50 Mon. - Thurs., $7 Fri. - Sat.

At the Museum on Tuesday, Gary Morgan (baritone sax, bass, etc.) brings in his sextet at 5:30. Morgan composes most of his own material, and is both prolific and expert. Ask for Ziltch City Blues.

At Hart House on Wednesday at noon, the Sam Noto Quartet (trumpet).

For two weeks beginning Monday, Basin Street will host the Boss Brass as they emerge from more lucrative individual studio work for a rare gig. This big band is as tight and dynamic as they get, and features some of the city's best soloists. 180 Queen W., 598-3013. Cover is $4 Mon. - Thurs., $5 Sat. - Sun.

Chet Baker toots his trumpet tonight and tomorrow for the diners at Bourbon St. Next week, Blue Mitchell brings in his trumpet.

At George's Moe Koffman finishes off the week. Monday brings in the Russ Little Quartet.

DJ's features the Swing trombone sound of Vic Dickinson until Saturday. Following him, the Jimmy Maxwell Quintet (trumpet) offer their talents to this former Dixieland haunt.

On Sunday November 27, the progressive jazz group (Weather Report) will perform at Convocation Hall. Shows at 6:30 and 9:00 p.m. Tickets are $6.50 for the public, $5 for students, available at SAC.

Filling the void left by the demise of Mother Necessity's Jazz Workshop last year, Cafe Soho continues to offer after-hours jazz at 334 Queen W. Tonight and tomorrow features the Glen Chadwick Quartet (guitar), followed by the solo piano expertise of Pat Clemence on Thursday November 24. 862-0199.

Stop the presses! The Vienna Choir Boys (remember the Disney show?) will be singing a selection of fave Christmas carols at Massey Hall on Dec. 4th. One show only, so start lining up!

But seriously friends, life is looking up. The immortal Kinks will be making one of their all too infrequent stops in our city on the 28th of this month at the Gardens. Their last show here was great. Billy Joel (okay, so he's a simp) puts on a very entertaining show which, despite its erratic nature, manages to transcend the quality of his music. He'll be at the Gardens Dec. 1st. At the same location, on the 21st of this month, Queen will fit in. Me and buck teeth.

In the less-notable-but-still-worth-a-couple-of-nyuks we have Mr. Humility himself, Gino Vanelli, at the Gardens on the 24th. Come and see his new chest hair transplant. Heavy metal three stooges, Rush, will be at the Gardens on the 29th. Cano, a new French folk-rock-jazz ensemble, will be at Con. Hall on Dec. 4th. Murray McLachlan (sic) and the Silver Wheelbarrow will be at Massey on Dec. 23rd. And the indomitable Good Bros. will be a stompin' at Con. Hall this very night.

In the way of local entertainment, the Jarvis House has Downchild tonight, the El Mocambo has Diane Heatherington, the Midwich Cuckoo has Malcolm Tomlinson and Larry's has Annie Woods. The Chimney has another bad New York punk band, The Fast, in this evening. The super Alleg Jazz Band will beat the Manila Harbor. The Gasworks has Talas, the Tube has David Matheva, the Hook and Ladder has Katyan (a group from Trinidad), the Horseshow has Colleen Peterson, the Riverboat has Paul Craft and the Black Bull (cheap beer) has Travellin Light. Personally, I'm going to take a taxi to Richmond Hill to see Toronto's most dynamic progressive rock ensemble, Zon, at Geromino's.

Coming Thursday Nov. 24th to Con Hall will be a Canadian Comedy Spectacular run under the auspices of Q107. Included will be the famous Peter Gzowski interviewing Norman Mailer sketch in which Mailer asks, "Peter, how do you keep a dipstick in suspense?" "Gee, I dunno Norman." "I'll tell you tomorrow, Petey". "Yes, please do."

On the home front, SAC is hiring the big band sounds of Crackers for Dr. John's tonight. I think I'll go home and watch them unload trucks behind Dominion.

It's a good weekend to stay home and think about who's appearing in Carnegie Hall. Tomorrow in the Unitarian Church (St. Clair-Avenue Rd.) a concert of chamber music by Jim Hicoot, who "attempts to bridge the gap between Western Art and Popular Music" by drawing on "Traditional Western Music, Pattern Music, Non-Western Folk and Classical..." Leaves no stone unturned at 8:30; tickets $5.00.

Sunday at three Ronald Chandler conducts the U of T Concert Band. Program offers a satiric live number; free in MacMillan Theatre. The Monday organ recital in Convocation Hall features Janet MacFarlane and bass Harry Maude. Starts at five; admission $1.

Isaac Stern appears with the TSO this week in Mozart's Violin Concert No. 4. Davis' Rite of Spring should be at least as interesting. Tuesday and Wednesday in Massey Hall at 8:30; rush seats at 7:00. The R.C.M. offers a free flute-piano recital in the Concert Hall Wednesday at 12:15.

Thursday at 2:10, Greta Kraus and the Collegium Musicum give a free concert in Walter Hall. That evening in the St. Lawrence Centre's Town Hall, guitarist Alexandre Logoya plays his first Toronto recital in years. Starts 8:30, a few tickets at 8:00.

Harpist at Hart House

I must be brief with my comments on Judy Loman's delightful Hart House recital of last Sunday, because I don't know harp from bedsprings. Some of the recital pieces — Bach's D minor French Suite and three Scarlatti sonatas — were Miss Loman's own transcriptions of keyboard works. To my ears, the difficulties of ornamentation and exact entries precluded a satisfactory rendering of Bach's part-writing. I don't suppose the impressionists loved the instrument for its dead-accurate articulation.

Scarlatti, however, sounds at least as authoritative on the harp as on Horowitz's Steinway, and Miss Loman played the three sonatas with a very clear understanding of the composer's style. Among the original harp numbers on the program the most interesting was a sonata by Hindemith, this century's patron saint of neglected instruments.

Judy Loman played intelligently and persuasively in traditional and modern styles. I look forward to hearing her transcriptions of the Liszt B minor Sonata and Chopin's Op. 25 Etudes.

Lady Blues Mean Business

The teams of the Eastern Division of the OWIAA Women's basketball conference had better beware. This year the University of Toronto Lady Blues are initiating their drive towards an improved divisional standing early in the campaign, and all indications seem to suggest that they are more than capable of achieving play-off status, a feat narrowly missed in the past two years. More importantly though, the "desire" to excel in this sport is shared by the entire team, perhaps to a larger and more significant degree than ever before in Toronto Basketball. This "desire" is in part due to the fact that every player acknowledges that the potential is there, and that with solid, consistent team play, anything can happen.

Integral in helping them to become a serious contender this year, is the return of no less than six veteran players, as well as two recruits from the now defunct Intercollegiate "B" team. Co-captain Janet Carson and forward Barb Grochowski will certainly play a key role in the stability of the offence, while Karen Zellen and Sharon Kosmachuk will be relied on heavily for their rebounding abilities. A welcome addition to the team this year is McMaster University graduate, Karen Pim, whose speed and agility is sure to be a valuable asset to the team. The likes of promising rookies such as Cathy Casey, Joan Mlynarczyk and Jo Stroeder are also a pleasant surprise to Coach Sharon Bradley. In short, the tremendous talent represented by this year's edition of the Lady Blues will definitely be a factor that Queen's, Carleton, Windsor and Brock will have to contend with. These teams will also have to deal with the wide variety of offensive patterns that Toronto is ready to unleash.

Perfection in the performance of these offensive patterns is one area that the ladies have been concentrating on in the past few weeks, and Windsor will have the first opportunity of dancing to the tune this week-end. Not to mention the fact that the defense of the Lady Blues is steadily improving day by day.

In closing, these twelve girls have made a strong commitment towards the achievement of their goals and with the help of Coach Sharon Bradley, their dreams may be realized.

Potent Offence Featured In College Bowl

By JIM O'LEARY

It is a surprise to no one, that the participants in this year's College Bowl (Saturday, 1 pm at Varsity Stadium) are the same two teams that met in last year's national final. Both the Western Mustangs and Acadia Axemen boast strong lineups which promise to make the rematch an entertaining, hard-fought affair.

In last year's game, the Axemen entered the third quarter leading but after having a touchdown called back, faltered and allowed the Mustangs to overtake them, for a 29-13 victory.

Both teams possess an explosive offence. Led by last year's All-Canadians, quarterback Bob Cameron and wide receiver Bob Stracina, the Axemen have rolled to an impressive 4,144 yards of offence and scored an average of 34.7 points per game.

According to Axemen coach Bob

Vespaziani the Acadia offence has more balance this year and does not have to rely solely on their two big guys to win games.

While Stracina was still their leading receiver they showed that he is not their only threat as Don Ross (29 receptions) and Drew Cooper (26) emerged as excellent receivers. Tailback Leavitt and tight end Ross each earned Atlantic Conference all-star team recognition.

The Axemen have also proven to have remarkable depth in the backfield. When their leading rusher Fred Leavitt was sidelined with an injury last week, backup Hubert Walsh stepped in and ran for 209 yards to lead Acadia to victory over Queen's.

Like the Axemen, Western also boasts an impressive array of offensive threats. Quarterback Jamie Bone was second to Cameron in last year's All-Canadian voting and was all conference this year, leading the conference in every passing department.

Bone also has an excellent assortment of receivers led by All-Canadian Craig Labbett. Playing out of the tight end position Labbett is both a deep and short threat. When Labbett is covered, Bone will go to either his wide receiver Nigel Wilson or hit Ross Tripp running out of the backfield.

Western also has a balanced running game featuring Ross Tripp and Bill Rozalowsky. Vespaziani thinks Rozalowsky is the key to the Western attack and remembers him from when "he came in to relieve Scarborough (Rick) in last year's College Bowl and did a great job."

If there is one area where Mustangs have an edge it would be on defence. Western has depth throughout their defensive team, placing four of their members on the all-star team.

Western's strength lies in their linebackers. Led by all-stars John Preistner and Duncan MacKinley, the linebacking corps has attained recognition for their aggressiveness and toughness. The defensive line is anchored by all-star Claude Riopelle and the secondary by Dmitry Kurilsky.

While they have only allowed an average of 9.7 points against, thus far in the season, the Acadia defence is somewhat suspect following their game against Queen's last weekend. Queen's gained 248 yards passing by completing only nine passes. Acadia, however, gave up only 85 yards against the rush.

If it is a close game, Acadia's kicking game will give them an edge. As well as directing the offence, Cameron doubles as the team's punter and enters the game with a 45.6 yard average. This is less than a yard short of the leader in the Canadian Football League. Acadia also bettered Western in the place kicker department as Stracina booted twice as many field goals as Paul Ford to lead the Atlantic conference in scoring.

Another edge Acadia has, is that they enter the game with a lot of momentum. In their last six games they have scored less than 32 points only once and have thrashed the opposition convincingly in each of these contests. Western on the other hand, started the season strongly but tailed off in the latter stages. In their last five games, they have won by a total of only 22 points and a couple of those victories were not assured until the final whistle.

Western coach Darwin Semotuk agrees that momentum is an important factor but is quick to point out that momentum can change quickly and often changes several times in the course of a game.

Last year's Hec Creighton Trophy winner and All-Canadian, Bob Stracina doubles as the team's placekicker.

Blues Rally to Trounce York

Over the last few years, whenever the U of T Blues and the York Yeomen have got together the result has been an exciting hard-fought hockey game. Last year, the lower ranked Blues saved some of their best hockey for York and defeated them in the playoffs. The games to date have indicated that this year will be no exception as the intense rivalry which has developed between these two teams continues.

On Tuesday night the Blues came from a two goal deficit to beat the Yeomen 7-3 in an exciting game played at the York Ice Palace. The win avenges the Blues' loss to the Yeomen at the U of T invitational tournament last October 29.

As has been the case all year, the Blues were paced to the win by an all out team effort which produced scoring from every line. The Blues also showed a new facet of their team when they were forced to rally from a two goal deficit to win the game. So far this season it has not been often that the Blues have been called upon to come from behind.

York started strong and took a two goal lead in the first period. In the early going, the Blues looked disorganized while the Yeomen, pushed on by a vocal home crowd, played aggressively.

By the mid-point of the first period however, the Blues had settled down and taken command of the game. They scored three goals before York talked again to tie the score at three.

From this point, the Blues took total command, showing why they are national champs. They checked and skated with ease while they piled up four more goals.

The scoring was once again distributed throughout the team. Cary Farelli and Frank Davis led the parade with two goals each. Single markers went to Doug Caines, Alex Jeans and Doug Herdridge.

The win pushes the Blues' record to 3-0 and moves them into sole possession of first place. They put their undefeated record on the line when they travel to Hamilton tonight to meet the much improved McMaster Marauders.

Blues Drop Cliffhanger

The U of T Basketball team dropped a nailbiter, 81-79 to the Laurier Golden Hawks in a game played in Laurier on Wednesday. The Blues were leading by 10 points with seven minutes left in the game but succumbed to a late Hawk rally.

The Hawks tied the game with 23 seconds left and then dropped the winning basket in the dying seconds. The difference in the game proved to be the Blues' inability to capitalize from the foul line coupled with their tendency to foul the Hawks.

The Blues tallied on only three of their eight chances from the foul line while Laurier was good on 17 of 26 attempts. Toronto took many of their fouls in the last quarter which greatly aided the Hawk comeback.

The Blues shot an impressive 44 per cent from the field compared to only 39 per cent for Laurier, outscoring the Hawks by 12 points. On most nights this would have been more than enough to win.

The Blues were paced by the fine play of Tim McGhie, Joe Braunstein and Randy Cook. McGhie led the shooters with 20 points and played a solid two-way game. Cook and Braunstein chipped in with 15 and 14 points respectively.

While mildly disappointed with the loss, coach John McManus thought his team "played a real good game." The forwards improved their shooting from their first outing against Laurentian and moved the ball well. If they could have stayed out of foul trouble they would have won.

The loss drops the Blues record to 0-2. Their next games are on Friday and Saturday at the McMaster invitational tournament in Hamilton.

Old Rivalry Revived

By JIM O'LEARY

The Western-Acadia matchup in this Saturday's College Bowl is shaping up to be an exciting contest for a number of reasons. For Quarterbacks Bob Cameron of Acadia and Western's Jamie Bone the game has special meaning.

Cameron and Bone are no strangers to each other, having crossed paths four years ago at the Acadia campus when they were both freshmen. From day one it became apparent to coach Bob Vespaziani that he had two very good ballplayers on his hands presenting him with every coach's dream problem.

"The coaching staff felt we had the two best young quarterbacks in the country which led to a lot of apprehension deciding who would play," recalls Vespaziani. In the first year both played and did a good job making the coach's problem even more difficult to solve.

After that first season, Vespaziani remembers that he spent the summer worrying about his quarterback situation for the next season. "We knew that both were capable of playing for any team in the country and that someone would want to leave before the coming season. There was no way a quarterback with their talent would be content to sit on the bench," said Vespaziani.

As expected, training camp opened with only one of the talented throwers back. Ironically, it was Halifax native Bone who transferred to Western whereas Ancaster, Ontario born Cameron remained.

Vespaziani is delighted to see that things worked out so well for Bone but is not the least bit surprised that they did. "Bone was a very dedicated player — 100 per cent football — when he was at Acadia," Vespaziani recalls. "He would stay and go over game films longer than some of the coaches in order to be ready for the opposition."

Although they played a thousand miles apart, the competition between the two signal callers continued. As both developed, their paths crossed again as they came into competition for all-Canadian honours and the coveted Vanier Cup, awarded to the winner of the College Bowl.

Last year, Cameron beat out Bone for the All Canadian honours while it was Bone who was triumphant in the College Bowl matchup. Heading into this weekend's action, both players are again in contention for the two top prizes a quarterback can win in college football.

While All-Canadian is a great honour, Cameron would trade it in any day for a College Bowl victory on Saturday. As for Bone, he would like to sweep the trophy department and go back to London with the Vanier Cup under one arm and an All-Canadian trophy under the other.

Volleyballers Demolish Ryerson

By GLYNIS PETERS

Toronto opened their season against Ryerson this week and walked away with a decisive victory. Results of the three games were 15-6, 15-7 and 15-5 testifying to Toronto's domination of the competition.

Ryerson, however, is without a doubt the weakest team in the division and Toronto will have a harder time this Friday when they take on Laurentian. Laurentian, ranked 8th in the country, as of November 1, was last year's OUAA champions.

Coach Titi Romet while recognizing Laurentian's strength, feels that the league this year is well balanced. "The team who is most consistent and makes the least number of mistakes will come out on top during the playoffs," he said. In this light, he is finding it difficult to prepare for the opposition. It is impossible to ascertain whether any team will play well or not on a given night. Queen's for example, are very strong on a strictly athletic basis but lack skills and refined team play. If they are clicking they may be devastating but if forced to rely solely on their skills they are in trouble.

Last year Romet selected a large number of first year students, who are back this year, making the team still essentially a young one. Also back this year, however, are two members of last year's All Star team, Peter Valjas and Tim Sim.

Canadian state "in the air"

By RHONDA TEPPER

Canada is currently in a state of "social economic confusion," according to Wallace Clement one of the speakers at a Sociology Colloquium jointly sponsored by University College and the U of T Department of Sociology. The conference, a Sesquicentennial event held Friday and Saturday, was the first of a series of three such conferences held to examine the interaction of independent and dependent states, specifically the theory and practice of the state independent countries.

Clement, author of The Canadian Corporate Elite and The Canadian Corporate Power, spoke last Friday on the dangers of foreign investment in Canada to the 250 professors, graduate and undergraduate students.

Clement claimed there is really no clear focus for the Canadian state, as it tends to be manipulated by a Canadian elite — top business managers. The state plays an ambiguous role in governing the country, he said, due to a dramatic rise in state (government) employees through elite control. Economic borders are not clearly defined and the state is slowly faltering in its responsibilities to society, because it is no longer being generated by society but by the elite, he said.

Powerful companies are dictated by profit capital, which rests in the hands of the wealthy few, Clement stated. The result is a fragmented and abundant working class and consequently unemployment. When Canadian industrialists seek raw materials in other countries where labor is cheap, Canadian workers are left in the cold and labor unions become powerless. Conflicts also arise in the attempt to please foreign investors and at the same time satisfy internal interests, he explained.

Clement also stated that Canadian politics have no coherent focus, as they are dominated by foreign demands. The legitimacy of the Foreign Investment Review Agency has been corrupted by the large American corporations, he said.

Canada has been forced to create jobs for its excess workers, he said. Local employment policies have been destroyed in the shift from commercial to industrial aims of the large corporations. Clement also warned that Canada will have to try to "behave itself" in order to maintain good economic standing with the U.S.

U of T professor Mel Watkins followed with the statement that Canada is a "puppet being manipulated by the U.S.A.," which he claims, is a totally capitalist state. He said Canada serves as a mediator for foreign investment between the U.S. and other countries. John Meisel, acting as discussant on the two points of view led the group to conclude that Canada displays several characteristics of dependency. Although Canada is not classified as a third world country, the speakers agreed it has a resource exporting economy and high levels of foreign ownership.

Robarts vending machines refuse to serve

By ERIC QUEWT

At the best of times it's tragic enough being caught by hunger in the Robarts Library, given the junk that machines spew as "food" in the Robarts cafeteria.

But lately louder gripes have been heard. Yesterday, for example, 14 of the 19 vending machines were out of order. Some of them even had "out of order" signs. Others you had to try out the hard way — by testing them with a quarter.

So, it's mid-afternoon, you haven't eaten since morning and you'd like a break from studying in the library, say, a sandwich and a coffee. Nothing fancy.

One of the sandwich machines has a sign on it. No problem: there are two other machines.

One of the two is totally empty. The third looks okay, so you drop in 45 cents.

The glass door won't open. None of them will on this machine. Press the coin return. A dime falls out. Only a dime falls out.

You'll settle for a coffee by now. The first machine is very polite:

"Kindly use other coffee machine."

Repairs are being made."

The other coffee machine doesn't have a sign but you have to wonder about the eight glasses half-filled with brown and green stuff sitting on the ledge in front of it. Eight previous consumers are trying to tell you the cream is sour.

A cold drink then? Both milk machines say, "out of luck." So does one of the two orange drink vendors. The other one gobbles up your quarter. Not being very bright, and getting rather desperate, you lose another quarter before giving up.

You go through a similar routine with the canned pop machine. You even take a chance on the carbonated pop machine. At least something comes out of this one. Too bad it isn't pop.

I went through something like this myself yesterday, after which I sought out the nearest maintenance man.

"Yeah, it's really something," he agreed. "I lost 25 cents myself this morning on a coffee machine that gave me hot water and milk. And the milk was curdled."

By GEORGE COOK

The three-person bargaining committee of the Student's Administrative Council (SAC) will present a wage offer to their counterparts from CUPE 1222 "probably early in December," according to University Government Commissioner Brian O'Riordan, a member of the SAC team.

CUPE 1222 represents SAC's 10 full-time staff members.

All parties agreed the negotiations, begun last September, are going well.

"I'm sure they'll continue smoothly," Alice Klein, acting president of CUPE 1222 and a member of the union's negotiating team, said last week.

SAC finance commissioner Doug Robertson, chairman of SAC's bargaining committee, termed the four bargaining sessions held to date "fairly productive."

The union, however, claims that SAC has been slow to make a wage offer. "They should have made an offer before now," Klein said.

Asked why SAC has not yet made a wage offer, O'Riordan, in a written response, said: "The SAC budget has not yet been finalized and it has not yet been decided whether there will be a referendum for a fees increase."

The union, however, rejects this. "Their budget can't be completed and approved until they know what their salary expenditures are going to be," union representative Molly Watson said.

Asked why SAC could not make a wage offer on the basis of its current financial situation, Tuzyk replied,

"We can't make a wage offer on the basis of what we have now. We'd be negotiating in bad faith." He said that in the event of a fees hike the union could claim that SAC's financial position had changed and that therefore the collective agreement should change.

Amendments to the agreement have been presented by both SAC and the union. SAC has proposed changes to the sections of the agreement dealing with Special Projects Staff (SPS), according to Tuzyk.

Klein, however, maintains that the union has received no indication from the SAC bargaining team what amendments might be proposed with regards to SPS.

Both SAC and the union have the right, under the agreement, to retain counsel or other aid for the negotiations.

SAC is advised by lawyer Louise Binder from the firm of Osler, Hoskin and Harcourt, according to Tuzyk. CUPE is aided by Toby Fletcher, a member of local 1281 representing several student organizations including the Ontario Federation of Students and U of T's Graduate Student's Union, according to Klein.

Fletcher, while recognizing SAC's right to legal counsel, maintains that the retention of a lawyer has "polarized" the situation. Klein said she believed SAC is using a lawyer in an effort to avoid the same sort of strike situation that arose over the last contract negotiations two years ago.

Tuzyk said SAC has retained a lawyer for labor relations for the past year and a half because "we have a number of unionized employees and we need to deal with them on a professional basis."

He declined to reveal the exact amount paid to Osler, Hoskin and Harcourt. "To do so would be a breach of lawyer-client confidentiality," he said.

The allocation of funds for legal services in SAC's current budget is $6,500, according to Tuzyk.

Fletcher receives no payment for his services to CUPE 1222, Klein stated.

Negotiations are taking place after a summer that has been described as "tense" by parties on both sides of the bargaining table.

According to Shelagh Paul, who was president of CUPE 1222 during the summer, tensions began with the termination of Terrence Regan, a SAC researcher. Regan was dismissed on June 30, 1977. He was still in the four week probationary period during which employment can be terminated "without recourse to the Grievance Procedure unless the Union claims discrimination," according to the agreement.

On the grounds of discrimination, the union filed a grievance on July 15, 1977, relating to the termination of Regan, alleging that he was not retained after the probation period because of "possible future activity with the union."

The grievance was denied by SAC on July 19.

It was filed on the basis of an alleged conversation that is said to have taken place between Tuzyk and O'Riordan before Regan's dismissal. Arts and Science Student Union (ASSU) fieldworker Terri Weatherhead claims she overheard O'Riordan say: "We've got the information, we're going to smash them," meaning the union, to which she claims Tuzyk replied, "You know whom we really have to watch." Weatherhead alleges that Tuzyk then listed several names, including Regan's.

Both O'Riordan and Tuzyk deny such a conversation ever took place. Weatherhead said she couldn't fewell complainant, I assessed the situation. The choices left were chips, soup, pastries and candy. Should I take any more chances?

It was an academic question. All my change had been spent, without having received anything for it yet. I had a dollar bill remaining but the change machine was on strike with the rest. Even its kid brother the quarter-changer was busted.

And there was no way to retrieve my lost $1.10 except to write it up for The Varsity and claim the money as research expenses.

remember the exact date of the conversation but added it took place in the Hart House pub "Cheeks." She claimed that SAC Vice-President Dave Jones and Women's Commissioner Caroline Caldwell were also at the pub.

Regan was contacted in Calgary where he is now working as the National Union of Student's (NUS) western fieldworker. When asked why he thought he was dismissed he said: "They're very worried about their union and they've said themselves if they would have waited for me to be an official member of the union they would have had difficulty firing me."

Under the terms of the agreement employees "become and remain members in good standing in the Union within 20 days of employment." On the day of his dismissal Regan was not an official member of the union. However, an employee considered by the union to be wrongfully discharged is entitled to a hearing under the grievance procedure.

Paul, when asked for her opinion as to why SAC dismissed Regan said: "They just wanted to show a little power. Terrence (Regan) was doing an excellent job."

"I got nothing but positive feedback on my job," prior to the dismissal, Regan said.

In a written response to the question "Why was Terry Regan not retained after the probation period?" O'Riordan said, "Mr. Regan was dismissed because of inadequate performance — he just was not working out."

Tuzyk stated that Regan's dismissal had nothing to do with his union activities.

Another grievance was filed by the union on August 22, 1977 in the case of a warning letter sent by Tuzyk to Ron Cohen of SAC's special projects staff. The letter, shown to The Varsity by Klein, charged Cohen with displaying an "inability to function in a cooperative manner with the members of the executive."

Another letter was sent to Cohen two weeks later, according to Tuzyk, in which the warning was revoked. "Basically the warning letter has no status," Tuzyk said.

Both letters remain on file at SAC. The union has not proceeded with the grievances. When asked for their reason Klein cited financial restraints. "It would cost $300 to $500 minimum for each grievance. Our treasury would be wiped out by one grievance."

Two incidents of disagreement between the executive and the union cited in The Varsity on November 11 did not result in grievances being filed.

The first involved Rick Charney, an ex-SAC representative who was hired last summer for a 10 to 12-week period. Under the agreement a staff member becomes a member of the union after 30 days of employment. The union, according to Klein, claimed at the time that Charney was a member of the union and that he was required to work according to the agreement.

During the summer, unionized staff are required to work 6 1/4 hours per day. Charney has stated that he worked eight hours a day, and that he received no overtime pay.

According to Tuzyk Charney's membership in the union was never officially established.

The matter was settled informally to the satisfaction of all concerned.

The second disagreement reported in The Varsity involved SAC and the staff on two different days during the summer when the temperature reached 31 degrees Celsius by 1 p.m. at which time the executive must remedy the situation or send its employees home according to the agreement.

"PQ like Quebec bourgeoisie"

By STEPHEN ELLAMS

If the Parti Quebecois is successful in creating an independent Quebec it will "create a hegemony for the Quebec bourgeoisie," stated Ann Legare of the Université de Quebec a Montreal. She was speaking at the symposium "The P.Q., Social Classes and the State" last Saturday held as part of the conference on "The American Empire and Dependent States" sponsored by U of T's Sociology Department.

Legare delivered her speech in French followed by a brief English translation. She examined the specific class nature of the P.Q. as defined by the political reality in which the party developed. According to Legare the reforms of the "Quiet Revolution" of the early sixties served to facilitate the growth of domestic capital. An understanding of the role of non-monopoly capital, she explained, is essential to an understanding of the P.Q. itself.

The class identity of the P.Q. is not defined by the people who vote for it, she said, but by its "leadership and clientele" which according to Legare is emphatically bourgeois. The emerging French-Canadian petit-bourgeoisie are rising to new positions of power in the economy and see the P.Q. as their political instrument, she stated. Legare explained that the P.Q.'s rise to power parallels the emergence of a Quebec bourgeoisie that is neither worker nor petit-bourgeoisie but "petit-bourgeoisie technocrat."

The second speaker, Jorge Niosi, also from the Université de Quebec a Montreal, became ill before his turn to speak and only a brief English summary of his speech was given. His major point was that the Parti Quebecois will not be able to keep its electoral promises to nationalize key industries or to take the province out of Confederation because of its dependence on Canadian and American capital and its social composition as a petit-bourgeois party.

The independence of Quebec would splinter the Canadian market into two or three areas and necessitate the drastic reorganization of corporations, said Niosi. The province's proposed anti-subsidy laws threaten to change the domestic situation in favor of labor in Quebec and by this example in the rest of Canada. For these and other reasons, said Niosi, the P.Q. will face a rocky road in implementing their policies in the face of the united resistance of the Canadian and American bourgeoisie.

The Parti Quebecois cannot effectively threaten the federal government with unilateral independence, said Niosi, because the effects of economic sanctions would be catastrophic. In conclusion he said the P.Q.'s working class support depends on promises it will be unable to fulfill. The P.Q. is aiming for a new Confederation and not independence.

Pierre Fournier of the Université a Montreal, replying to both Legare and Niosi, attempted to "dispel the myth that the P.Q. represent a major break from the parties that preceded them." In fact, said Fournier, "the P.Q. are the natural successors to the Liberals."

The Bourassa government was equally nationalistic and just as anxious to please the bourgeoisie as is the P.Q. said Fournier. The aims of the P.Q., according to Fournier, are "to strengthen the Quebec state in detriment to the Canadian state and to aid the Quebec bourgeoisie."

Canadian capital is "running scared" said Fournier, as it is dependent on the Quebec market. American capital is more relaxed as evidenced by the ease with which Levesque procured substantial loans on the New York money market. On the whole, said Fournier, the American capitalists would prefer one northern neighbor to two, but not enough to raise much of a fuss.

Consensus of the speakers present was that the P.Q. represent the emerging French-Canadian bourgeoisie class asserting itself within its natural territory. The ultimate aim of the P.Q. is sovereignty-association in the framework of a new Confederation under the tutelage of the French-Canadian bourgeoisie, they said.

Gerhart growls over deficit

By PHILIP LIBMAN

Due to a lack of "commissioner control" the Communications Commission of the Students' Administrative Council (SAC) overspent on its summer budget by $6,100. Communications Commissioner Doug Gerhart revealed at a commission meeting last Thursday.

Last spring, Gerhart said, $4,500 was allocated for account number 465 on the basis of estimated costs for the SAC survival kit, summer mailing, and ads in various campus handbooks.

However, the sum spent for that account was $10,609, he stated.

The money was overspent, according to Gerhart, because "over the summer there was no control over the spending procedure."

"Money could and was spent on the authorization of the people in charge of the particular projects with no overall view to the budget. I wasn't here full-time over the summer and the Communications Commissioner has to be here full-time."

"We also got screwed by the person in charge of the survival kit. He said it could be done for $700, but instead he spent $5,700," Gerhart continued.

"There is no spending approval procedure, but the Finance Commissioner Doug Robertson is working to solve it this year."

"In the past," Gerhart explained, "individual commission budgets would be set unrealistically high, so that if one budget ran over, money would be taken out of another budget which had leftover. But now, we are faced with cutting back services or raising the fee paid by students to SAC."

SAC president John Tuzyk, however, said last night, "we knew all along what we were adding to the budget. The executive and the commission approved the added expenditures at the end of July and the money was spent in August. It was either spend the money or not have the programs," he said. "We are being blamed for the expenditures of previous councils when we are spending less money than last year's council."

Gerhart agreed last night that council approved the increased budget but these were open-ended measures and SAC didn't stick to the budget guidelines. "There was no great impropriety, just a lack of foresight and lack of planning on the part of SAC."

SAC's legal position is sound, Gerhart said at the meeting as he had budgeted an extra $4,500 deficit for this year as a result of the overspending. But Tuzyk said, "This is normal procedure as the spring budget only covers the summer and the executive during the summer, regularly authorizes more money for needed programs. That is our spending approval procedure."

The Communications Commission discussed at the meeting the cost and effectiveness of their summer programs.

The cost of 10,000 survival kits to 8,500 freshmen was cited. SAC spent $1,591 on duo-tang binders, $517 on the production of the mini-directory, and $1,320 on labor, which Gerhart described as "100 percent too much."

Four arrested at York

By PETER HOHENADEL

Four people were arrested by 31 Division Metro Police Friday afternoon after a fight broke out in Central Square at York University.

Arrested and charged with assault and bodily harm was Jeffrey Forest, Communist Party of Canada Marxist-Leninist (CPC-ML) member and Professor of Social Sciences at Atkinson College.

According to police headquarters at 590 Jarvis Street three students also arrested and charged with disturbance by fighting were James Nugent, Wolodzimierz Szenberg, and Barbara Ann Nunn, who was also charged with possession of weapons dangerous to the public peace.

The problem began last Thursday when a spontaneous discussion in Central Square began between CPC-ML members and Zionists and other students, according to Gary Empey, Vice-President of University Services for York's student council (CYSF) who was present at the skirmish.

Temper flared when CPC-ML members denounced Zionist presents as racists, he said. A student responded by tearing down a CPC-ML poster bearing a picture of Slain, said Empey. The poster was soon replaced.

On Friday, CPC-ML members came back for another informal discussion. According to Empey and the managing editor of York University's student newspaper the Excalibur, Ted Mumford, another member of the CPC-ML came to act as an enforcer. He was concealing a three-foot long, two by two inch piece of hardwood under a coat. When the enforcer wanted to speak, he gave the club to a female accomplice (Nunn).

At this point, Empey approached Nunn and managed to reveal the weapon, the crowd of more than 100 people started chanting "we want the club." The woman refused to give it up.

According to Empey, seven cruisers and one unmarked car arrived on the scene. Nunn was physically removed after a brief scuffle. Empey stressed that "at no time were the police disrespectful."

At the same time, said Empey, a fight broke out at the CPC-ML's information desk between a CPC-ML member and a student. These two people were also detained.

There are many groups that keep information desks in Central Square.

"The summer mailing, at a cost of $977, could be sent with other mail from individual colleges."

The survival kits were not evaluated as to their success or lack of it, Gerhart said. The committee decided to prepare a comprehensive report to evaluate the worth of all the programs and advise next year's student council.

"We can't take money out of the contingency funds like we used to," said Tom Simpson SAC Engineering rep. "Inflation and growth have taken care of that," said SAC vice-president Brian Hill.

The committee also ratified the staff democracy motions passed at a recent Varsity staff meeting. The only change proposed by Gerhart was that "The Varsity staff, as defined by the by-law, shall be the final determinant of the paper's editorial policy." The Varsity reporter pointed out that this has traditionally been the case, but Simpson responded: "Now with the SAC constitution and incorporation we must get everything down in black-and-white."

The committee also decided to ask the SAC executive to "approve in principle" the idea of setting up formal meetings between the student powers on campus — namely SAC, The Varsity and other media, and the student governors. "Collaboration is needed on the big issues," said Gerhart, "and we must work together."

An amount of $300 was requested for Radio Varsity, with a possible maximum of $3,000 "to spend over the year," said Gerhart. "We hope to open the station full-time in the New Year," he continued, and we will do it on the basis of support from the 35 volunteers who have signed up.

"Our slogan is 'Make it Go With No Dough'," Simpson articulated.

When questioned how the committee could justify an expense for the radio station, when SAC is running a deficit, Gerhart replied: "The Radio station is an important priority and the costs would be minimal, with this year's costs going to fix up damaged equipment."

The committee then approved in principle their support of the station and the expenditure.

Kontest

Well folks, the last week of the Kamera Klicks Kontest is upon us. Get all your shots in by this Thursday, 1 p.m. and you shall be entered in the contest. The photograph should be 8x10 inches, black and white and interesting. Should you not have your own printing facilities, the Varsity will print your picture for a very minimal fee. All entries received by Thursday December 1st will automatically be entered in the grand final. The winning photo will be printed in the last issue (Dec. 7) of the semester. Click away . . .

Radio Varsity on the air next term.

By MARK LUKASIEWICZ

Radio Varsity should be on the air in January. Recent organizational meetings have brought together enough people to begin regular daily broadcasts of music, features and news.

The station last broadcast more than two years ago. The new operation will be far more limited, with virtually no budget and only volunteer labor according to Radio Varsity spokesmen.

The station will not be transmitted "on the air." Rather, it will rely on closed-circuit wire systems connected to speakers in public areas around campus.

When Radio Varsity suspended operations two years ago, there were over 100 such speakers on the St. George Campus. The volunteer technical staff of Radio Varsity is tracking down, replacing and repairing these speakers, hoping to get as many as possible in operation by January.

The old Radio Varsity also transmitted its signal to several university residences through lighting currents, permitting residents to hear the station on the AM dial. The technical crews are investigating reinstalling these systems.

The initial Radio Varsity programs in January will be mostly music. DJ's will draw on a large record collection amassed by Radio Varsity until 1975.

News broadcasts will be presented twice a day, at 12:30 p.m. and again at 1:30 p.m. They will consist of a mixture of international, national, local and university news.

Many facets of the station's operations have yet to be decided. No "station manager" or other supervisors will be appointed, and most decisions are being made by committees of those interested in the station.

Not just anybody's thrills, Jay Cochrane dares the heights on a tightrope 500 feet above the ground last Saturday at 2 p.m. The walk took Cochrane eight minutes from the Hudson Bay Centre to the Plaza II hotel with only a balancing pole to steady him in Toronto's high winds. No safety nets were around to catch him if the need arose. Before he tried the walk last Thursday, the cable broke in the wind. The stunt was part of the Hudson Bay's Christmas promotion campaign.

"A code of ethics isn't something you post on the bulletin board. It's something you live every day." — from an ad by Pennwalt Corporation, who say "for 126 years we've been making things people need — including profits."

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprise. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university.

The Varsity is managed by the Varsity Committee, which is responsible for the management, financial policies, and editorial integrity of The Varsity.

An express function of the committee is to receive and consider complaints about the paper. Formal signed complaints — as opposed to letters to the editor — should be addressed to: The Chairman, Varsity Committee, 91 St. George St., Toronto, Ontario.

CAMPUS CENTRE NEEDED

Six years ago SAC proposed the construction of the Campus as Campus Centre. Two years ago the Governing Council gave its approval in principle to the project. Today the Planning and Priorities Committee will be asked to honour that commitment. It cannot refuse.

It cannot refuse if its members consider the need for the project, a need so glaring it is difficult to ignore. To those members who doubt its urgency, we suggest that they abandon their offices this afternoon and try to find a seat in the Sidney Smith lounges to have lunch.

Neither can the committee refuse if it considers the cost of the proposal, a pittance when compared with other campus construction projects.

Campus as Campus Centre was born after the last-minute termination of plans for another student centre in 1969. It is a good proposal: good enough to gain acclaim in architectural circles and approval in principle from the Governing Council.

The project has not been built because in early 1975, the Governing Council ruled — at the urging of the administration — that the bazaar section be completely self-financed.

The "bazaar" was to be the centrepiece of the Campus as Campus Centre development. Located along Sidney Smith on Willcocks St., it would house large lounge and meeting areas of the kind acutely lacking in that area. In addition, it would house a bank, food outlets, stores and a student pub.

The Governing Council, by ruling that the building pay for itself, made its construction impossible. The requirement that free space — lounges and lobbies — operate on the "users pay" system, was then and remains patently absurd.

It is this no-net-cost principle that is at issue today. The Planning and Priorities Committee will be asked to recommend to Governing Council that it remove the principle from Campus as Campus Centre.

Campus as Campus Centre was proposed in 1971 to meet an immediate and pressing need. Six years later that need is all the more acute.

The University administration once again opposes spending any money on the project. It is argued that student space will be present in the proposed "southwest campus development", and that therefore no campus centre "bazaar" should be built.

But the administration cannot promise that which it has no power to give. The campus development is only a proposal in its earliest stages; it is at least six years away; it may house student facilities, but then again, it may not.

If the administration favors student space in the southwest campus development, we applaud the suggestion. But that suggestion has nothing whatever to do with the Campus as Campus Centre proposal.

Campus as Campus Centre is long overdue. The Governing Council must not refuse it.

Hit me please

OK guys. I think that up to this point I've been a paragon of patience. I refer, of course, to the fact that thus far the Review has managed to insult all manner of ethnic and ideological minority groups, with the glaring exception of one (I mean, how could ya guys, ya got one right under your noses, eh?). I hereby request, nay demand, that the Review insult short lobotomized folks, so that I too may have my chance to write in a righteously indignant fusillade denouncing the Review and all it stands for.

Antipode impounded

We wish to inform you that on the 11th of November, 1977, the Canadian Customs at Peace Bridge, Fort Erie Ontario, impounded copies of the geographic educational journal Antipode. Two distinguished professors visiting Canada from the U.S.A. were refused permission to bring these journal copies into Canada on the grounds that the Customs officers did not consider the material to be "really geography". This is not only a professional slight to the visiting academics, but seems to be an extremely arbitrary decision.

The second reason offered for the entry refusal was that the journal was not marked "Printed in the U.S.A." In future, the publishers will undertake to print place of publication on the journal.

We wish to express our dismay at the action taken by the Customs officers and to strongly request that Antipode be registered as an educational journal that can be brought freely into Canada.

Popular culture

Could there have been two lectures on the significance of contemporary popular culture delivered last Tuesday?

Were it not for the fact that I am credited with the talk described under the patronizing and totally misleading headline "Pop professor finds social values in sitcoms", I would have concluded that my reporter attended a completely different talk from the one I delivered. To be sure I do recognize here and there in your article topics, words, sometimes even phrases which did actually appear in my talk, but the line of argument, substantive points and actual conclusions which the article attributes to me, I find utterly unfamiliar since they represent as often as not, the diametrical opposite of what I actually said.

While I did discuss the historical transformation of culture into a commodity, I did not conclude that this necessarily leads to a debased art. I did indeed consider the implications of the fact that since situation comedies are produced as series no single episode can change the basic relationships on which the series is built (i.e. Archie Bunker can get his comeuppance, but he can never change). I did not however cite this as an illustration for the thesis that situation comedies use social issues as vehicles of comedy but offer no solution. I did argue that

Mary Hartman attempts to distance its viewers from the form of soap operas (not situation comedies) but I did not say that it does so "by ridiculing the importance of the personal problems behind most sitcoms." I did talk about the difficulties in maintaining ongoing interest in a parody, but I most definitely did not conclude from this fact that content is always sacrificed to form in popular culture. I did talk about Star Trek and Star Wars (though I did not call the former a "film") and did attempt to demonstrate how both in different ways reinforce rather than challenge the status quo, but I did not base this conclusion on the fact that in both good always triumphs over evil, nor did I identify "good" in Star Wars with "the force." I did discuss the relationship between rock music and challenges to the status quo, ending with a brief look at punk rock, but I did not say that violence cannot be assimilated into the status quo (though I did say that some punk rockers do believe this to be true). Finally, to illustrate the difficulty in arriving at precise aesthetic or social evaluations of contemporary cultural phenomena, I did refer to two totally contradictory assessments of punk rock current among cultural critics (that it represents an alternative to the artistic sterility of commercial rock music, or that it represents a degradation of art and of human beings). I did not however present either view as necessarily my own, and certainly did not, as the article implies, try to maintain both views simultaneously.

I am flattered that the Varsity thought my lecture interesting enough to devote an article to it. I am somewhat less than flattered by the systematic misinterpretation of my lecture in the actual article. Least flattering of all, however, (even less flattering than being called a "Pop Professor" in the headline) is the illustration your editors chose to accompany the article. The ludicrous caption "explaining" the significance of the Superman cover in the illustration is not — unlike the article itself — the result of an honest, if somewhat maddening misunderstanding, but represents rather a deliberate editorial cheap shot, and is totally unworthy of a newspaper aspiring to serious journalistic standards.

Anti-semitism in Bob Review

Victoria College's variety show, the Bob Review, was performed for the enjoyment of that college's student body last Thursday, Friday and Saturday evenings. The skits which make up the show satirize common social situations at the college, whether they be scenes at the Vic pub, spoofs on various well known members of both the faculty and the student body, or caricatures of well-known politicians or political events.

Vic student Mike Webster was part of the audience at the Bob on Friday evening. Between the first and the second skit, a person on stage places a pair of heavy glasses on his face to which are attached a pair of thick eyebrows and an overly large and curved nose. Two actors walk on stage and notice this person. One then turns to the other and says "My, they're really letting everybody in these days". Webster said "the audience's reaction was one of polite disgust. People around me were saying 'oooh, that was poor'. There was no doubt in my mind that that was an overtly anti-semitic line. Furthermore, for Victoria University Students' administrative Council-President Alistair McCrear to play one of the roles is mind boggling. Some voting members of this college's student body are, after all, Jewish. He continued by stating that "VUSAC gives financial assistance to the Bob. Why should part of my fees go to support such gratuitous nonsense."

Several students I spoke to said that they didn't think the line was anti-semitic. "I just thought it was funny" one said. Bob contributor, Robin Wardlaw told me that the intention of the line was to make fun of the snobs at Vic. "That was the only intention of the sequence", he stated.

Another student involved in the production of the Bob stated that the line was directed "against those who held such bigotted feelings". But when I asked her to explain the majority's reaction, she admitted that it could have been misinterpreted.

Vic student Cole Raftery thought that "the audience did not misinterpret the line because there was only one possible meaning to take away from it. I was personally disgusted by it. Furthermore, I have acquaintances at whom personal remarks have been directed in past Bob Reviews and they were really vicious and uncalled-for. Those writers have a twisted sense of humour." Webster and I both agreed that while the line could have been up for misinterpretation, the stereotyped disguise could not have been.

It was clear that some people involved with the production believed the line to have been written in innocence. The majority of the audience, however, clearly felt otherwise.

Blues money useful elsewhere

If lack of fan support is making it hard for the men's hockey Blues to "dedicate" themselves to their game, and if, as Hugh Stuart suggests, they are making "great sacrifices" to represent the university, may I suggest their charity is misdirected. I was under the apparent delusion that intercollegiate athletics play for the love of the game, rather than adulation.

If the Blues are unable to draw even 500 fans for a home game, it's time to re-evaluate the entire "star" system of sports in the university.

In the USA, college sports are money making venture which in turn makes generous sports scholarships possible. Commercial sports are a market commodity the merits of which will not be discussed here. However, if the fans stop paying-coming, resources should be diverted elsewhere, for example, into interfaculty athletics.

At present, students have no choice about being consumers of intercollegiate sports. Athletic fees are a non-negotiable surcharge on the price of university attendance. The star system allocates the money to talent on the basis that "prestige" and "pride" are reasonable returns for the rest of us. While bringing home the hardware may make good press and induce alumni to open their cheque-books, those who love to play (as opposed to win or watch) are the losers in this system.

As a female recreational hockey player, I see the one hour pre-season practice time supplied to us (our two teams shared the Varsity arena ice with another college) as two teams shared the Varsity arena ice with another college) as a poor return on my athletic dollars. We have to pay for ice time or try to book outdoor community rinks while the Blues are moaning about empty seats. I may not be as skilled a hockey player, but who is to say my enjoyment of the game (i.e. of ice time, equipment, training) is any less than that of any other student?

Now that the cost of men's star sports can't be justified on even entertainment grounds, let's move some of the wealth out of the elite and into some gloves and shin pads for the other students at this university.

Nazi Newreels demonstration misrepresented

Recently the Varsity has printed a number of letters and articles regarding the protest held outside the November 8 showing of the "Nazi Newreels of Joseph Goebbels." The many complaints, criticisms and misrepresentations the protest has provoked from all stripes of liberals, pseudo-intellectuals and cranks has apparently obscured the objectives of the protest. To the extent that attacks on the protest arise out of sincere misunderstanding of the action, generated by the many unscrupulous and dishonest letters that have appeared, we of the Trotskyist League (U of T Club), as initiators of the petition and protest, feel a reply is called for.

First of all, to reiterate a point: it was the context in which the films were shown, and not the showing of the films in the abstract, that we and several other members of the campus community felt demanded a response. The brochure advertising the films was a disgustingly sensationalist and provocative whitewash of Nazi atrocities. In the context of this promotion, it was important to protest the showing of the Nazi Newreels — both as an affront and insult to those who suffered from the Nazi genocide, and because the advertising was an open invitation to fascists to attend.

When a work of intentional political propaganda like Goebbels' Newreels is shown, it is the context in which it is being presented that we use to determine whether or not protest is called for. For example, Leni Riefenstahl's classic Triumph of the Will is both a piece of Nazi propaganda and an important film for its innovations in documentary technique. When, for example, it is shown by the history course union (as it has been in the past) there would be no reason to protest it. However if the same movie were being shown at a meeting of, for example, the fascist Western Guard, it be appropriate not only to demonstrate, but even to mobilize opposition in order to bust up the event. We do not defend a supposed right to "free speech" for these genocidal terrorists. We support the demand "no platform for fascists" because these sworn enemies of the working class and racial and ethnic minorities recruit and grow not through political campaigning, but through demonstrating in action their intentions and strength. While small in number today, the fascists are still potentially dangerous. Witness the recent rapid growth of the British National Front, feeding off the social and economic decay of British capitalism, or the stories about the terrorist activities of Toronto's Western Guard appearing daily in the bourgeois press.

The workers movement, Jews, blacks and all others who would bear the brunt of future attacks by fascist organizations cannot afford the fascists the luxury of freely developing their parties of death and devastation. The organized workers movement, in alliance with the oppressed minorities, must deal decisively with the fascists while their numbers are small. Our goal is the formation of a disciplined defense based on the strength and authority of the organizations of the labor movement and oppressed masses. While cautioning against tactical adventurism and substitutionism, we seek to see the fascist scum driven off the streets and into their ratholes wherever and whenever possible, depending on the all-sided relationship of forces.

At the same time, as Marxists we would never call on the bourgeois state to ban fascists and/or their propaganda. Neither would we demand that the state censor movies, books and the like. Any government ban against "extremist" groups will always be used as a bludgeon against the left, not the right. For every fascist persecuted by the state, thousands of labor militants and leftists will be victimized. Likewise, the demand for censorship is always a reactionary call on the bourgeois state, which uses censorship only to further the interests of the class it serves.

To respond to a few particulars: The hysterical demagoguery of Robin Holmes only slanders the protest with baseless accusations, i.e., that it was based on "half-truths" and "deliberate misunderstandings." She denies that a "significant number" (whatever that may be!) of fascists has ever attended Reg Hart's films. She would do well to stop her whining and talk to Hart — it was he who informed us that fascists have in the past attended his screenings, saluting and shouting "Heil Hitler" when this mass murderer appeared on the screen. As for the "good name" of Innis College, we might point out that this is the college whose council just two years ago instituted a bureaucratic, anti-communist ban on all literature sales in the building to stop leftists from selling in the college.

As for Kim Michasiw's ignorant suggestion that the protest "advocated the censoring of a film on the grounds that it is insulting or dangerous" and his infantile editorializing in his movie review column ("If Innis hasn't been bombed yet," etc.), this kind of journalistic dishonesty only serves to discredit the writer.

In response to the protest, Reg Hart produced a 'self-criticism' the night of the films stating that "We have reached the point where we now feel that in all respect we must add our name to the list of people protesting the ambiguity of the original pamphlet (sic)". However, the next day Hart threatened to sue Varsity editor Mario Cutajar and the other protesters for libel, making the ludicrous accusation that we accused him of being a fascist in the same petition. He apparently endorsed the night before! Clearly we are not dealing with the most rational of individuals.

Since the protest, the offensive posters advertising "Nazi Newreels" have not to our knowledge reappeared. We consider it a victory that the outrage over this incident succeeded in a stopping distribution of the poster, and accordingly did not protest the next showing of the Newreels. We are confident that, should there be future provocation like the Regus films advertising — or an attempt by fascists to organize on campus — the opposition will only be more powerful after this experience.

Trotskyist League (U of T Club)

Capitalism and unemployment: roots of the current crisis

Even a cursory glance at the daily newspapers points to the fact that the most faithful defenders of the capitalist system admit that a "recession", unparalleled since the Great Depression, is upon us. While there are many manifestations of this crisis, one key aspect is scandalously high levels of unemployment.

Unemployment has been rising steadily over the past 8-10 years and continues to rise. This trend towards chronic high unemployment signals an important shift in the nature of capitalism. It is a symptom of the growing inability of capitalism to regulate the economic life of society.

A satisfactory explanation of the present chronic unemployment requires three fundamental Marxian concepts:

(1) labour power — which is the only commodity which the workers bring to the market — his ability to work — and the value of which is the historically determined average wage;

(2) the reserve army of the unemployed — which is the unemployed section of the working class and which is necessary to provide a reserve of labour power to allow short run expansion without any pressure on wages;

(3) the industrial cycle — which in 19th century Britain was decennial and which is necessary to ensure an advance in productivity and a sufficient reserve army to allow continued long run expansion.

The Keynesian Innovation Following the nightmare of the Great Depression when unemployment hovered around 25 per cent, governments (including the Canadian) came under increasing pressure to guarantee everyone work.

Up to the 1930's, orthodox (bourgeois) economic theory did not recognize the possibility of significant unemployment; the reality of the depression resoundingly contradicted this view. Keynes "resolved" this contradiction by showing the theoretical basis for chronic unemployment within capitalism and its "resolution" through government spending. Unfortunately for capitalism it is not possible to alleviate one of its more noxious symptoms, unemployment, and at the same time expect the system to continue to function normally.

True enough, the post World War II period has been one of almost uninterrupted economic growth with only minor recessions. True enough, continued economic expansion and lavish government spending have managed to absorb, for the most part, a growing labour force; moreover, steady technological advance has allowed wages to rise without incurring significant inflation. But now this "magic dream world" is crashing down. Why?

Is it the oil prices charged by the Arab states? Or is it an influx of new immigrants? Maybe it's the Russians! In fact, the answer is in our own back yard.

Post Keynesian Dilemma The complete story would require a book. The essence is the following: As we noted above, Keynesian "full employment" policies prevent the industrial cycle from periodically establishing a reserve army and therefore a lower average wage.

At the same time, within the very nature of a highly monopolistic, technologically advanced, capitalist society, is another important reason why this industrial cycle-reserve army mechanism is prevented from functioning.

The Marxian cycles of the 19th century liberal capitalism were decennial. This was in accord with the technology of the era which, given its small scale, could be discarded and renewed approximately every ten years. However, with the arrival of the age of steel (late 19th century) and now the computer age, such regular uncontrolled cycles would destroy the very system which they served to regulate. Just witness the Great Depression. Clearly from the capitalist point of view this cannot be allowed to happen.

Yet on the other side, without this renewal of the reserve army by means of an industrial cycle, the worker is in effect not selling his labour power on a market where supply is regulated strictly by demand. Consequently, the value of this labour-power can no longer be as ruthlessly adjusted to the needs of capital. Nor can the inefficient capitalists and old techniques be as easily squeezed out. Thus the preconditions for further economic expansion once established through the industrial cycle are not created. Stagnation results with a commensurate inability to provide employment opportunities for a growing labour force.

The chronic unemployment of the 1930's forced on the system a policy of full employment which in turn has resulted in renewed chronic unemployment, though substantially different than that of the thirties.

Though Keynesian policies followed upon popular pressure, they also coincided with the objective needs of capitalism in the 1930's.

The capitalism of the 1970's suffers problems which Keynes did not only not foresee, but which arise as a direct result of the pursuit of Keynesian policies. In spite of the legion of economists and seemingly bottomless government coffers, the present system cannot be extricated from its endemic stagflation. This is not surprising given that the cumulative problems of capitalism date back a full century.

Creative Writing: the State

By George Cook

For its community of writers the University of Toronto is a rolling countryside dotted with towns and villages. They travel like itinerant preachers from one settlement to the next, writing, talking, criticizing. Occasionally they pause, but rarely do more than a few pause together in the same place.

During the last month, in conversation with many of those people currently involved in writing, publishing, and teaching on campus, I have heard it lamented that there really exists no centre for writers or writing at the University of Toronto.

Roger Greenwald, who organizes a writing workshop at Innis College, terms it "a geographical problem": one, essentially, of a lack of a central location where writers can meet. At a recent Hart House library evening to discuss writing on campus Ed Jewinsky, a poet and co-ordinator of a poetry series at New College told the group: "There's no way campus writers can get together. There's no communication between one group and another."

It is true that no central focus exists — no place where all writers can gather — no single conviction to which they can adhere — but there are reasons for this and reasons why it is, in fact, wholly satisfactory that no such centre should exist. The campus is a network and the community of writers, teachers and publishers is a small group of people whose names crop up time and again while they are at the university.

They tend to gather around the college magazines, the U of T Review, the writing courses and workshops and the Varsity. One finds that they are writers and organizers at the same time. They form the nucleus of a larger community that includes those whose only interest is in writing poems, stories, plays or essays. Nevertheless, the community exists, and its members communicate directly with each other, or indirectly through the work they do.

The fact that there is no single focus is due in large part to U of T's colleges which, despite efforts to amalgamate them, have stubbornly continued to survive. Not that the combination of old college departments and the standardization of courses hasn't taken its toll; but by and large the network of groups that make up the writing community have continued to remain somewhat distinct from one another.

The distinctive qualities stemming from the college system show themselves quite clearly in the differences that still exist between various writing courses or workshops attached to various colleges. These qualities are largely determined by the people who organize and direct the courses; but it is safe to say that without the colleges the number of choices students have would be reduced.

Frank Watt teaches a writing course at University College. His method is informal and unstructured in so far as there are no exercises his students are required to perform. The classes run as workshops. Submissions are duplicated, read and criticized by the group.

"I don't consider myself a teacher of creative writing," he says. Watt sees himself as a means of bringing young writers together and giving them the benefit of a critical audience.

At Innis Roger Greenwald works on much the same basis. His is a non-credit workshop funded by Innis and open to non-students as well as students. Greenwald avoids trying to be the "teacher" and sometimes submits his own work for criticism by the group. The Innis workshop is in part an attempt to break down the barrier that often exists between students and the community at large; it is a sort of meeting place for people with a wider range of experience than one would find in the course offered at U.C.

A similar group was begun after October's writers-in-residence conference. The same concerns were voiced there, by writers and students — that there is no centre of literary activity on campus. What resulted was not the creation of a centre but the establishment of another element in the network, one whose character and direction have not yet been determined fully. Although it is co-ordinated by Carol Bolt, this year's writer-in-residence, she has not attempted to influence its direction. As in other such cases, the group must define itself.

In alternate years a writing course is offered at Brindale College by Josef Skvorecky. His course, which deals only with fiction, is more structured than Watt's and the workshops'. Students have eight writing assignments to complete in the first term. After Christmas the course goes free-style and writers bring their choice of material.

A similar offering is made by David Knight at Victoria. During the first term students alternate between a poetry assignment one week and prose the next. On one occasion the class members might be required to describe an incident, for example, without using dialogue, and then to give an account of it using dialogue only. On another occasion they might have to write a Petrarchan sonnet. As with Skvorecky's course, the second term is less structured.

An evening in Knight's class reveals the basic pattern and approach. The students first consider the piece in silence for several minutes. Tentative

U of T's writer in residence

Varsity: How did you start writing?

Bolt: I always wrote, from the time I was a kid. And when I was in school I took this creative writing program. I was supposed to get my degree in creative writing, but they decided they wouldn't give degrees in creative writing because they weren't very sure of themselves; that was the first year that anybody was eligible, so I just got a degree in English.

Varsity: Where there any early influences — anyone who encouraged you to write — teachers or parents?

Bolt: Well, I suppose that at UBC the people there encouraged me — all the people in writing — Jake Zilber, Warren Tallman, particularly Warren and Tony Friedson — but that's about all. No one else ever encouraged me — my family didn't. My family always thought it was very odd, and my mother continues to find it odd, although since her friends started sending her newspaper clippings she finds it a little bit less odd; but she's still not at all sure.

Varsity: Was UBC — the course there — was that useful in teaching you anything about writing?

Bolt: I don't honestly think so, but I think what it was useful for, was that it made it possible for you to identify yourself as a writer on however little evidence, I mean, only on the evidence that you were there and you knew all the other writers and you were presumably passing the course, although it didn't do anybody any harm to fail it either.

Varsity: Do you think writing can be taught?

Bolt: I don't know, you know. I know that you can encourage writing and that there are, especially in play-writing, a lot of technical things; but I don't think that, say, 19 is a good time to learn them, because when you're 19 you should be writing about the stuff you really care about and making all the technical mistakes in the book if you like, you know. There's not much point in teaching someone who's writing out of, say, great passion, how to do entrances and exits and so on, I don't think.

Varsity: Since you've been on campus is there anything you've noticed, or anything that's struck you in particular?

Bolt: Well, there doesn't seem to be any centre. I keep saying that and I'm getting pretty bored with saying it; but there doesn't seem to be any poetic that anybody espouses, or any group that believes in one thing or another. There doesn't seem to be any politics to it except for the most basic kind of university politics.

Varsity: What do you mean, basic university politics?

Bolt: Oh well, that I shouldn't have said either; should I? No, I mean, basic in that most of the discussion about what the writer-in-residence is seems to come down to what kind of value I can show the world at large. How many students does the writer-in-residence talk to. It's all sort of like a numbers game at the same time. I mean, there's an x quality that's called prestige, you know, and it's like algebra, it's not like anything else. You have x equals prestige, plus y number of students, x times per year, plus x number of z number of guest lectures, with q attendance, you know, and you add all that up and you make it equal $20,000, which is what the writer-in-residence costs, and then you divide it on a per head service basis and then you say, "My goodness, this is peculiar," but it's a very peculiar exercise to even think of doing it in the first place.

Varsity: When the year is over what would you like to have accomplished, both in terms of being writer-in-residence at the university, and in terms of your own writing?

Bolt: Well, I would like to have finished a certain number of things that I want to do, and started some others. I mean, that's a list of really specific projects that I have in mind to do, say, by next September. And I would like to have found, or happened upon, or read some more really good writing. The ideal thing would be to take some of the writing further, you know, so that both I and the person that's working was happier with it, or more excited about it, because happiness is perhaps too stable a state.

Varsity: If you were going to give good advice to a person who's been writing for a while but isn't really established yet, what would it be?

Bolt: I don't think there's anything general, you know. I don't find myself saying the same thing to everybody.

Varsity: I remember talking to you before and you said that somebody should have told you that you didn't have to, you know, go out and get a job — that you should have been more aggressive, put yourself forward more.

Bolt: I don't know if... I mean, somebody could have told me that. I don't know if it would have done any good, because I think that it really didn't do me any harm to kind of kick around for ten years, you know — in the long run, I mean. Supposing that I had been a regular whiz-kid, and started out and said, "Okay, well, I must go down to New York, or I must go to London," then it would have been a completely different experience, you know. I quite value being a thirty-six year old semi-beginner. There's a value to hurrying at it, you know, and there's also a value to being able to watch yourself doing it.

Varsity: At the writers-in-residence conference, W. O. Mitchell went on about writers having a godfather figure, or godmother figure, I suppose. Have you ever acted in that capacity?

Bolt: Yeah, I think so.

Varsity: Do you think of it as a responsibility?

Bolt: Oh yeah, I think it's a responsibility, you know, I think that if you see good writing, that you have to encourage it every way that you can. I guess it's not so easy to stop somebody from writing if they really want to, but it would be a terrible thing, a terrible responsibility to stop somebody from writing.

Varsity: Are there any playwrights you particularly admire?

Bolt: I answered that question yesterday. It could give you a different list today.

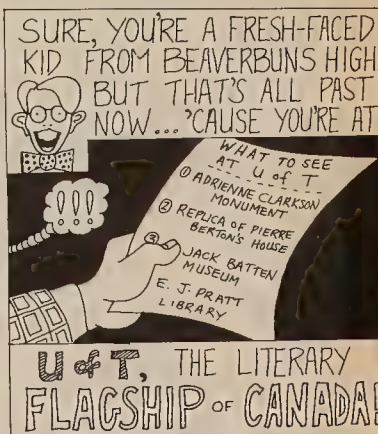

Varsity: Say, in particular?

Bolt: Shakespeare.

Varsity: Why would you admire Shakespeare?

Bolt: Well, because he's a genius.

Varsity: Dumb question.

comments begin with compliments. After a few minutes some criticisms are offered. Someone objects to the use of a certain word or image and then, as more people join the conversation, the criticism becomes less guarded and more general. When everyone has had a say the writer speaks, either to agree or disagree with the group's conclusions.

Criticism by a group can be a painful experience. This is especially true with writing; it is often personal and reflects much more directly on the character of the arrive in his course, are often unaware of many of the forms and techniques of writing. People are more sophisticated, he believes — they know more about being people — but they are not well taught. His object is to teach people, or reveal to them, the laws of writing. "The state of the art is a practical ceiling on the imagination," he says. To give writers the best chance to write well that ceiling must somehow be raised.

For Knight laws are not rules. Laws of writing are analogous to natural laws; they cannot be even they need models to imitate. For that reason it is as vital for a writer to read other work as it is for a sculptor to study art.

The need for balance is demonstrated clearly by the lack of basic education. You can't make choices — you can't choose to write effectively, in other words — if you simply don't know what choices are available; and yet too much emphasis on traditional forms can be stifling. As things stand now liberality in primary education has advanced to such a point that those interested in writing arrive at university without much notion of the rudiments of the craft. It is like asking someone with no idea of musical notation to compose a sonata.

literary review of some sort. Victoria has Acta Victoriana; Trinity, the Trinity Review; St. Michael's, Grammaeion; University, the UC Review; Innis, Writ; Scarborough, Scarborough Fair; Erindale, the Laomedon Review; and, collegeless, the U of T Review. With such a number of little magazines the question must be asked: What for?

It has been argued, by David Howes, editor of the Trinity Review, and by Bruce Meyer, co-editor of Acta, that the magazines are part of a cultural tradition within the colleges. It would be nice if this were true. Unfortunately the lessening of the significant distinctions between colleges and the centralization of the university administration has meant that there is, in fact, very little difference between one college and the next. The magazines exist, in a sense, as an extension of traditions which, unfortunately, have ceased to exert a major influence on the cultural life of the university. With the exception of format and layout — the actual shape of the magazines — Acta, the UC Review and the U of T Review are doing much the same thing — providing space for writers. There is very little that makes the UC Review any more representative of UC than Acta is of UC.

There are, however, differences between some of the magazines. Like the differences between the writing courses these exist thanks to the protection of the colleges, but the attitudes reflected by the magazines are those of their respective editors.

Writ, for example, publishes work from all over North America and, though generalizations are somewhat dangerous, it is safe to say that Greenwald, who edits the magazine, has exerted an influence needs first. Howes sees the Trinity Review as an instrument of encouragement for writers at the college, and a look at the magazine does confirm that, to a certain extent, it succeeds. Partly because of its very direct college orientation and partly because of the editorial position of Howes (the Trinity Review is the only one to separate the organizational function from the editorial one by the appointment of a business manager) the Trinity Review manages to include literary essays as well as the more traditional poetry and fiction.

There is, however, a more important question here. Most of U of T's older colleges have had, and still do have, in actuality if not officially, religious affiliations. These are what determined, to a great extent, a college's distinctive place in the university community. Those affiliations have, however, ceased to exert a strong cultural influence on the colleges and the university as a whole.

There is, therefore, no significant cultural identity for the college publications to reflect — unless such an identity is created, for the magazine and for the college. Perhaps, in order to resist the process of assimilation now taking place and to maintain the possibility of real choice between, to put it vaguely, cultural values and traditions, some segregation is necessary. It is, in any case, not enough simply to provide space.

Carol Bolt has said that there are no politics to writing at U of T. This is perfectly true. There exists no real diversity of cultural attitudes, or attitudes to poetry on the campus. The lamentations over the lack of a centre are, to a certain extent, superfluous; the dominant attitude renders a centre unnecessary. David Knight terms it "the international style" of poetry. Real diversity, and the possibility of real choice in writing can best be re-established through the colleges. In terms of the magazines it is, therefore, necessary to cultivate and encourage separate college identities.

Writers and writing could only benefit from the possibility of real choices. It is clear, however, that most of the current editors are, in the main, organizers. The Trinity Review demonstrates that it is possible, by separating the organizational from the editorial function, to provide some aesthetic focus within a college.

Despite the erosion of a valuable college system and the failure to create new identities in the colleges through the magazines, the state of writing at U of T is not hopeless. There is an increasing enthusiasm for writing and publishing. Those involved in writing at U of T are beginning to ask questions. As Howes put it, "The campus is coming alive again, after so many bad years."

'Writing courses.... become addictions' writer than do many other arts on their artists. These courses tend, therefore, to encourage a sort of intimacy that is not often found in conventional English courses.

Knight believes such courses are useful, up to a point. He contends that writing courses make people better "practical critics", but he warns that too many writing courses can be detrimental. "It bloody well tempts people into an addiction" to the course itself, he says. Eventually the writer must go it on his own. As Frank Watt points out, it takes two things to be a writer — talent and the willingness to making writing an important part of one's life — not so easy when one must earn a living and spend time writing as well.

Knight claims the greatest problem new writers have is a lack of primary education. The public schools, he says, no longer teach fundamentals of prosody and poetics, so that writers, when they disobeyed with any success. A character must, by his nature, create a certain sort of dramatic situation in a novel, just as an apple, when it falls from the branch, must come to earth. His advice to writers is, "Do it, don't talk about it," and "find yourself a good reader and don't trust him too much."

All the writing "teachers" are skeptical about the desirability of a creative writing program at U of T. Carol Bolt seems to agree. The problem is basically one of balance. You can benefit from group criticism, but too much of it can either destroy your confidence or make you dependent on other's judgments rather than on your own. Too much structure can destroy whatever enthusiasm you have for writing, but too little can, at least in the beginning, leave you totally without guidance. Many writers avoid courses or workshops and are none the worse for it. But

The fundamental usefulness of all writing courses lies in their ability to make writers aware of their work from a reader's point of view. If, after careful consideration, the reader is unsatisfied or puzzled by a piece of writing, there is probably something wrong with it.

Once one has written something, and has had it criticized, it is usual to want to have it published. There are writers who will tell you they write for themselves alone; that may be, but one is always tempted to ask them why, in that case, they have told you they write at all.

There are eight literary magazines on campus. They are, for the most part, written, edited and read by students. That sort of concentration of publications exists, once again, largely because of the protection of the colleges, and the college student councils, who provide money.

Most of the colleges have a which shows in the choice of material. Writ avoids one of the problems constantly facing the little magazines on campus — continuity — by having a permanent editor.

The Laomedon Review, certainly one of the best of the college publications in terms of the quality, range and vivacity of its material, tends to publish more fiction than the smaller magazines. It too accepts material from outside the student community.

Only the Trinity Review restricts the submissions it accepts to members of that college. One is tempted, quite naturally, to nod one's head and mutter the word "establishment", when one learns of this. But David Howes, the editor, makes a reasonable case for the limitation.

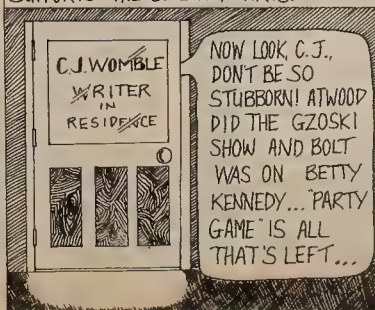

Like most college magazines the Trinity Review is funded by the students of the college; it therefore has an obligation to serve their

'Ecology more than a dollar and cents issue'

By ARTHUR ROTENBERG

Decisions on environmental issues should be made by politicians and guided as much by political intuition as by objective factors, according to a leading authority on environmental pollution from the United Kingdom.

Lord Ashby of Brandon spoke on "Environment and the Politician," in the last of the Sesquicentennial lectures sponsored by the Institute of Environmental Studies at OISE last Thursday afternoon. Ashby, the founding chairman of the UK Royal Commission on Environmental Pollution has led a distinguished career as a botanist, academic administrator and public figure in the UK and Commonwealth.

Ashby gave a detailed three-part explanation of political decision-making on environmental issues. He first attacked cost-benefit analysis as a possible basis for decisions, stating that issues had to be resolved at the political level. Secondly, he discussed what politicians should (and often do) base decisions on when faced with scientific and ethical needs. Finally, he argued that nature has intrinsic worth beyond its use to society: man is in symbiosis with nature and "must consider this symbiosis in his lordship over it."

As chairman of the Royal Commission Ashby once said: "On a cost-benefit analysis, slavery would never have been abolished." In his lecture, he rejected as "myth" the utilitarian suggestion that society's welfare can be evaluated in terms of economic welfare functions, subject to cost-benefit analysis.

To illustrate his point, he considered the differing personal and societal costs of a man unable to work through some incapacitating accident. The economic loss to society is simply his wage. However, the personal loss to his family and friends is much larger, Ashby pointed out. He stressed the importance of recognizing "fragile values" that cannot be quantified economically. "How could you ask a sufferer of bronchitis what he would pay not to have bronchitis?"

He acknowledged the value of preserving an ecosystem or an Eskimo culture as some Canadians hope to do in the Mackenzie Valley. Decisions about the environment are unique in that they always involve conflicts of values, he emphasized.

How then, asked Ashby, should a politician take into account the "soft" values seeking to preserve nature, culture and personal rights together with the hard facts and judgements presented by scientists and economists? Acting as a "neutral aggregator of public values" would be "a recipe for confusion," Ashby pointed out. On the other hand, acting according to "overriding principle" is unacceptable because one "can't persistently overrule public opinion."

Ashby feels that political decisions about the environment are made on "hunch."

"Hunch," he said, is a vague subjective process by which a politician feels his way into the decision suiting the values in conflict and the public perception of the problem. Ashby maintained that the politician must deal with many uncertainties and irrationalities. He cited the public view that airplanes are more dangerous than cars when statistics clearly indicate the reverse.

To illustrate what he meant by "hunch," Ashby used a biological analogy: whereas a growing animal has its purpose and behaviour determined from birth, the evolution of a species is completely indeterminant and unpredictable. The direction of evolution is continually redefined by the process of evolution itself. In the same way, Ashby believes that every political decision about the environment creates conditions for the next decision; built into the process of deciding is a process of constantly redefining ends.

When asked during the question period to elaborate on the psychology of "hunch," Ashby confessed that he knew of very little research in the area.

Writer of Newfoundland plays was inspired by James Dean

By PETER HOHENADEL

Playwright David French.

The Varsity — Peter Hohenadel

"I don't live in an ivory tower," said Canadian playwright David French. "My home is in the streets."

French met Wednesday with faculty and students at New College for an informal discussion of his life and work. His works have been frequently produced all over Canada. French was born in Newfoundland and moved to Toronto as a young man. Living "all over town" at the time, he worked at a variety of jobs and studied acting at U of T.

French spoke of the effect of his life on his work. In particular, the Newfoundland trilogy (that began with Leaving Home), closely parallels the anguish of his home life. From the germ of his experience, French developed poignant, spontaneous theatre "in which the characters create themselves."

He recalled the influence of James Dean on his early development as a writer in the fifties. French's anger drove him to experiment with poetry, short stories, and novellas before settling into plays. After selling his first play to the CBC for $425, French decided he had found his element. He recalled thinking, "oh boy, I'm going to write 10 plays a week," after his first success. But it was to be another one and a half years before French sold his second play.

After a stint as a television and stage actor and scriptwriter, French brought what he called his most promising play to Bill Glassco, director of Toronto's Tarragon Theatre. Glassco liked the play, and suggested some dramatic alterations that initially angered the young playwright. But after a period of reconciliation, ("Glassco was impressed with my anger," French said), the two became effective collaborators. Glassco's Tarragon was the locale for French's first real success as a playwright.

French spoke at length about the craft of playwrighting. His first draft is always spontaneous, an "unconscious manifestation" of the theme he is trying to express, he said. After the first draft, he revises each page 12 to 15 times, seeking the most natural mode of expression. Often, French said, he will alter his text at the suggestion of an actor or director if the script does not play well.

A meticulous craftsman, French has become extremely conscious of his style. "Everything is in there for a purpose. I get furious if my publisher even leaves out a comma," he said.

Despite his early experience as an actor, French remarked, "I'm terrified of acting. I always hated it," although he stated that he would like to act again in one of his own plays.

Several of French's plays are now being translated for production in Belgium and France. His international success, however, has not always been assured. A recent off-Broadway production of Leaving Home was a critical disaster.

French is presently working on a film script for his play One Crack Out, about an unlucky pool hustler pressured by loan sharks. French is also using the play for his second foray into American theatre in New York City in January.

Despite his success as a playwright, French feels "stuck with the economy of the theatre." He would prefer to write novels in which he could extemporize and draw on a wider range of characters, he said.

Women slowly taking over at Hart House

By ANDREW MAHON

Since 1891 Hart House was regarded as the bastion of male supremacy at U of T. In 1971, however, its doors were opened to women and now for the first time in its history Hart House has a female desk porter.

Jean Keen has been tending the duties of Hart House since July of this year and so far she "enjoys it very much."

A porter's duties include making reservations for squash courts and guest rooms, handling towels and lockers and watching over a myriad of keys, she said.

"We open the doors in the morning and close them at night," says Keen.

The porter's hours are divided into three shifts which keep the desk manned (or womanned) from 6:45 in the morning to midnight.

Keen has lived in Toronto all her life. She recalls visiting the university once for a wedding, "but that was years ago when there were houses here."

Before coming to U of T, Keen worked as a desk clerk in a motel and for "Chateau Cartier Wines" at Bathurst and Queen. "I could tell you lots of stories about that!" recalls Keen, "but that's as far back as I want to go."

Once she got the job at Hart House Keen took the campus tour to get acquainted with the University. "I like the old buildings here," she says, "especially Convocation Hall and Hart House."

"What impresses me most about Hart House is the winding staircase from the Great Hall to the Senior Common Room — people are very lucky to have a place like this at the university."

A slight mistake occurred when Keen began her duties at Hart House. While showing someone around the building she inadvertently walked into the men's locker room.

"Since then I have to be careful. I always phone the gym before I go over to get towels — they meet me on the staircase."

Keen says she hasn't seen any celebrities go by the desk, ("I probably wouldn't recognize Dr. Evans if I saw him"), but she did see Dennis Braithwaite one night when he came for a debate.

"Unfortunately I don't get much of a chance to talk to students," she says, "but I do hear them when 'Cheeks' (the Hart House disco) is on."

"When I began, a lot of people would call and ask for the Hall porter. I would say 'I am the Hall Porter.' One gentleman said, 'Good God, what's the university coming to.'"

It's a lively job, according to Keen, from the squash court line-ups in the morning to the theatre crowd late at night.

"It certainly keeps you hopping," says Hart House's newest porter.

USSR: life's not peaches and cream

By JOHN MACE

The USSR faces mass opposition to its government policies today said visiting Russian historian Igor Glagolev last Thursday at a seminar sponsored by the Centre for Russian and East European Studies. Speaking to about 35 people at the Roberts Library, Glagolev discussed human rights and the political situation in the Soviet Union today.

Glagolev, a senior member of the Institute of History of the Academy of Sciences and a frequent consultant to the Central Committee and the Foreign Ministry before he left the USSR in October 1976, stated that 60 million Soviets out of the total population of 260 million are Communist Party members.

He revealed that during the 1940's the Russian people feared Stalin's concentration camps. If they didn't vote in elections it was tantamount to voting against the government — hence most people voted.

One-third of the population didn't vote in the last elections, Glagolev

Architecture goes to town

Working with donated time, effort, ingenuity, materials and a "very tight budget" from the university, students and staff of the School of Landscape Architecture have succeeded in giving their corner of the campus a facelift.

Deciding that "creative people can also be pragmatic in a positive sense," the group set out to design and construct a new office and a student lounge.

Charles Simon, assistant professor at the school, produced together with his architectural partner the working drawings for the project. The furniture was designed by assistant professor Jim Belisle, and built by student Fred Bolduan.

The three tons of brown brick for the floor were donated by a Streetsville brick company and plant materials donated by the Parks department through student negotiations. The construction contractor for the project donated his off hours to the school at no extra fee.

Two Saturdays ago, the volunteer laborers cut and laid the bricks. Materials used in the renovations were natural — wood, water, vegetation and brick. Cedar frames and clere storey tops in the central student lounge area allow for maximum light according to the student architects.

The group recycled the old fluorescent lighting in the lounge area and the new lighting fixtures are inexpensive industrial spinners. A fountain planned for the area was curtailed for lack of funds. The school hopes for individuals or companies to make tax-deductible donations for the water component. A plaque carrying the names of the donors will be mounted in the entrance of the department.

Architecture students put their knowledge to work.

said. He cited mass discontent over the present life style, the desire of youth for higher education, and the end of the Stalin era. The children of the millions who died in concentration camps have heightened this discontent, he maintained.

Glagoiev stated that the detente between Eastern and Western nations is non-existent. He claimed that since detente the Communists have taken over Indochina and fought wars in Africa and Israel. Soviet armed forces have doubled in size and their missile stockpile has tripled in size, he stated. Glagoiev said he personally knew the people in Moscow organizing the wars in Africa. It isn't a question of black versus white in Africa, but Communist black forces against everyone, he said.

He viewed the strategic situation in the West as "much better" now than it was just after World War II, citing democracy in India and the expulsion of Russian advisors from Egypt and Somalia. He felt that the American lifestyle, very appealing to Soviets, is creating instability in the Communist governments. Foreign broadcasts help keep the Russian people informed, Glagoiev said, but complained that the Voice of America was "too shy."

The Russian dissident also criticized the use of Western economic aid for manufacturing trucks used by the army. The West is defeating itself by these actions, he said. The Russian economic, political and social situation is unstable, Glagoiev maintained. The Communist government will survive for quite a few years, "but not for centuries," he stated.

Glagoiev saw a "democratic trend" in Soviet thought. If the West would unite politically, economically and militarily, he said, the USSR would eventually weaken and fall. A member of the audience, however, pointed out that Russia has historically been an anti-democratic society and that Glagoiev had possibly misinterpreted what he had seen. He also contended that if the West did unite it might strengthen the position of the Russian government.

Glagoiev said the standard of living in the Soviet Union is much lower than it is in the West. There have been shortages of meat, fruit and vegetables and wages have been reduced for teachers and scientists. He did say, however, that the position of workers and farmers has improved. He claimed that the mortality rate has increased since 1964 by 38 per cent and pollution and alcoholism are on the rise. Glagoiev argued that the widespread censorship hampers progress as every new manuscript has to be based on previously written material. Television, he claimed, is used primarily for propaganda purposes.

Lady Blues Win Again

By JEANNE GRAY

The University of Toronto Women's Basketball Team travelled to Windsor last Saturday to play their second league game. It was the second time this year that the two teams had met, and on both occasions, Toronto captured the decision. Saturday's final tally was Toronto 56, Windsor 39.

A major contributing factor in this victory was the much tighter and more consistent defence displayed by each of the members of the U of T squad. Karen "Z" Zellen and Jane Leuty dominated both offensive and defensive boards, while Sharon Kosmochuk turned in her best offensive performance to date.

Coach Sharon Bradley seemed tremendously pleased with the team's efforts, yet noted that the score should have been much higher for Toronto. A few untimely miscues on the fast break pattern, and some problems with sinking the easier inside shots seemed to be all that prevented Toronto from doubling the score. That's not to say that Windsor was never in the game, however. In fact, the Lancers were within a 10 point spread for a good portion of the game, with their defense coming up big in steals and interceptions. Their folly however, was the superior conditioning of the Varsity squad, and their ability to play good positional basketball. Also, fouls proved costly, as the Toronto squad shot 70 percent from the free throw line. Sandy Turney led this category with an 8 for 8 record with Janet Carson following close behind. From the floor the team sunk on 33 percent of the field goals taken. This is considered a fairly good record.

The Intercollegiate schedule continues this week with Toronto playing host to two league games. On Wednesday, the cross country rivals, York will be here and on Friday Queen's will provide the competition.

Wrestlers Go To Waterloo

The U of T sent eight wrestlers to Waterloo to compete in the Waterloo Invitational Meet held last Saturday. Four of the eight were new to wrestling which resulted in the Toronto performance being less than impressive.

The meet was an intermediate tournament which is organized to allow freshmen and less talented wrestlers a chance to compete with their peers. First and Second place finishers in OUA competition are barred from participating in this type of meet.

In light of the fact that many of the Toronto representatives were new to wrestling coach Joe Rabel felt the performances were not too bad. "I was not 100 percent pleased but half of the guys turned in pretty good performances," said Rabel.

The Toronto team was led by Al

Tanane who fought in the 126 pound class and won four fights. The first year science student won one by a pin and the others by decisions.

Andris Smits took third place in the 220 pound class. Smits is in his first year of competitive wrestling. Allan Kosugi also turned in a good performance. He won only one of his three bouts but was competing in the strongest weight division. Rabel is looking for a good season from Kosugi.

Next week, Toronto will be sending a team to the Ryerson Open. This is one of the most prestigious meets of the season and draws competitors from all over Ontario and Quebec as well as some from the United States and the Prairie provinces. Rabel advises that most "carded" wrestlers from Ontario and Quebec will be in attendance.

Cameron Wins Hec Crighton

For the third time in four years the winner of the Hec Crighton Trophy as the outstanding player in intercollegiate football in Canada, hails from Acadia University. This year's winner is 23 year old quarterback Bob Cameron.

The six-foot-one-inch 185 pound Cameron, is a fourth year psychology student from Ancaster, Ontario. This past year he led the Atlantic Conference with 105 completions in 192 attempts for a total of 1756 yards and 15 touchdowns.

As well as being an excellent passer, Cameron is also the country's premier punter. Over the season he compiled an impressive 45.8 yard average.

Cameron's professional rights are owned by the Edmonton Eskimos. Last summer he had a tryout with the Eskimos but was disappointed to find they were not interested in him as a passer, but only wanted him to punt.

He hopes that his latest recognition, coupled with the exposure he will receive as the quarterback of the Canadian team which will play in the Can-Am Bowl in Florida, will earn him a chance to prove himself as a quarterback in the CFL. His chances of success however seem remote unless the CFL changes its designated import rule.

The winner of the J.P. Metras Trophy as the outstanding lineman in Canada is Dick Bakker of Queen's. The six foot three, 225 pound defensive end led his team in quarterback sacks. His greatest asset is his quickness off the line.

Gord Goodwin of the University of Calgary Dinosaurs is the winner of the Peter Gorman Trophy as the rookie of the year. The five foot eleven, 200 pound running back was the fifth leading rusher in his conference with 313 yards on 52 carries. Goodwin is also an excellent blocker and led the way for his running mate, the number two rusher in the league.

Acadia Overwhelmed By Western

By JIM O'LEARY

The College Bowl rematch between the Acadia Axemen and the Western Mustangs was anything but the hard-fought, close battle predicted by many. Instead, Saturday's game at Varsity Stadium turned into a one-sided exhibition of football efficiency as the Mustangs neatly felled the Axemen 48-15.

The Axemen came to Toronto from an impressive offensive performance in the Atlantic Bowl where they demolished Queen's 35-22. Against Western however, their offence lay dormant most of the afternoon. Quarterback Bob Cameron could not get the offence to click until the fourth quarter when the game was already hopelessly out of reach.

Western, on the other hand, turned in a flawless offensive performance as they rolled up a record-breaking 528 yards. The attack featured the running of Bill Rozalowsky who unofficially, romped for 177 yards on 23 carries to win the Ted Morris Trophy as the game's most valuable player for the second year in a row.

Rozalowsky was obviously pleased with his performance but was quick to point out that "satisfaction comes from winning the college Bowl. Individual recognition means nothing if the team doesn't win."

Rozalowsky was aided by the terrific play of the offensive line. Western controlled the line of scrimmage throughout the afternoon and opened huge holes, especially on the right side.

The Ted Morris trophy could have just as easily been awarded to quarterback Jamie Bone who called an excellent game. "We just put it all together, everything seemed to work today," said a jubilant Bone. "The line did an excellent job which allowed us to establish the run setting up our passing game" he continued. "We kept Acadia off balance all afternoon."

Bone admitted that the win was especially pleasing since he out-quarterbacked Cameron, who earlier in the week had won the Hec Crighton Trophy as the nation's outstanding player and was named to quarterback on the all-Canadian team. "It helps to psyche a guy up knowing that he is going to be going against a quarterback who has won all those awards," said Bone.

Mustang coach Darwin Semotiuk was ecstatic about the margin of victory. "We just played a flawless offensive game," marvelled Semotiuk. "When you score that many points you must be doing something right!" he continued. "Our game plan was to come out and establish the run to make our passing game go. We executed perfectly all during the game and got great performances from Bone and the offensive line."

The Mustangs' game gave a clue as to what kind of game the Axemen could expect when they marched 82 yards for a touchdown on their first possession of the game. The drive was highlighted by the hard running of Rozalowsky who gained 50 yards on six carries. In all, the Mustangs ran the ball nine times in a row before Bone connected with Tom Arnott for an 18-yard touchdown pass.

The Axemen got on the scoreboard at the end of the quarter when Bob Stracina missed a 27-yard field goal that went for a single.

The Mustangs came out throwing in the second quarter and moved into a 19-point lead. A 39 yard pass to Nigel Wilson and a 12 yarder to Walt Payeri set up a 27 yard field goal by Paul Ford. Bone then came back to hit Payeri with a 59 yard touchdown bomb after the elusive receiver had managed to beat the man-to-man coverage Acadia had been employing. Ford connected on a 38 yard field goal to send Mustangs to the dressing room with a 20-1 halftime lead.

Acadia destroyed any chance of a second half comeback when they fumbled away the opening kickoff on their own 15 yard line. The Mustangs had little trouble running the ball in from there with Ross Tripp going over for the major. The Mustangs moved into a 41-1 lead after Bone connected twice with Wilson for touchdowns on throws of 14 and 33 yards.

The Axemen offence finally came to life in the fourth quarter and scored two touchdowns to save the Atlantic champions from total humiliation. Cameron threw touchdown passes of 37 yards to Don Ross and five yards to Ron Martin to close the gap to 41-15.

Backup quarterback Paul Ford came off the bench to direct the last Mustang score. After moving the team to the Axemen 19 he handed off to Rick Chalupka who barreled over a number of defenders for the score.

NOTES: Darwin Semotiuk will now begin to prepare the All-Canadian team for their trip to Florida to play in the first annual Can-Am Bowl . . . Attendance for Saturday's game was over 19,000 . . . The Mustangs did not take a penalty or commit a turnover in the game. Over the season the Mustangs only lost one fumble . . . Jamie Bone is contemplating a career with the Winnipeg Blue Bombers while Bob Cameron is expecting to report to Edmonton next year . . . among the records broken in the game are most points scored, most touchdowns, most converts and most yardage gained by one team (unofficially).

Cagers Split Weekend Tourney

By JIM O'LEARY

The Basketball team travelled to Hamilton to play in the McMaster Invitational tournament on the weekend. In the tourney they played teams from McMaster, Brock and Winnipeg and came away with a record of one win and two losses.

Their only victory was a convincing 92-74 win over Brock. In this game, coach John McManus used all his players as is evident by the distribution of the scoring. No one player stood out in the scoring but instead nine players potted between seven and 13 points.

Joe Braunstein led the team with 13 points with Prince and Randy Cook right behind with 12 and 11 points respectively.

Against McMaster, Toronto was behind by only seven points at the half but according to McManus "we went to sleep in the second half and they blew us out of the gym." McMaster is going to be tough over the season according to McManus. They have a good centre, all-star forwards and quick guards.

Against Winnipeg, the difference was on the foul line. Both teams shot an excellent 43 percent from the floor but Winnipeg emerged with an 84-81 win.

Foul trouble has been a Toronto problem all season according to McManus. The Blues seem unable to play defensive ball without drawing costly fouls. Guard Doug Fox, has been particularly noticeable for his fouling and has fouled out of most games this season.

Toronto's best player over the weekend was Randy Cook. According to McManus, the big center was the best rebounder in the tourney as well as a proficient scorer.

Joe Braunstein also played well for the Blues, providing the points which were noticeably absent from the forwards in some of the past games.

While he was generally happy with the way the team played, McManus feels there is a lot of room for improvement in the defensive play of the team. Last year the team was strong defensively but had trouble scoring points. So far this season, the offence has been clicking while the defence has been letting up.

"If we could get it all together we would be alright," claims McManus about the defensive problems.

Tim Allan

All-Canadian

Offensive tackle Tim Allan, of the Blues, has been selected to the All-Canadian football team. Allan is the only member of this year's team to be selected to the squad.

The six-foot-two, 240-pound Allan is coming off his best season in Toronto, where he anchored an outstanding offensive line. Varsity fans can expect to see Allan to go high in this year's CFL draft.

Volleyballers Drop Two

By ANDREW MAHON

The Blues played a lot of volleyball this weekend, but they didn't come away with any points.

The Toronto team played well against Laurentian and Queen's but lost both contests in exciting 5-game matches.

On Friday at U of T, the Blues started strongly against a tough Laurentian team and won the first two games, 16-14, 15-4. However the persistent Laurentians were able to capitalize on Toronto errors made later in the game winning three straight, 15-9, 15-12, 15-9.

It was much the same story on Saturday as the Blues lost another heartbreaker to the Queen's team.

"Queen's have a scrappy team," said coach Tiit Romet after the game, "they have a lot of talented individuals."

Blues lost the first game 15-11, but came back in the second, winning 15-13. Queen's took the third, 15-7 but Blues rallied again in the fourth game 15-10. However, in the final game it was sloppy errors by the Toronto team which gave Queen's the edge, 15-8 despite some fine work by all-star Peter Valjas and excellent net-play by Tim Sin.

"I can't really be disappointed," said the Toronto coach, "we have a young team and with experience we'll eliminate some of those mental errors."

Blues play next Saturday at U of T, when they take on Ryerson at 11:30 am and York at 3:00 pm.

Blues Keep Rolling

By JIM O'LEARY

The Varsity Blues hockey team continued their winning ways with a 12-4 romp over the McMaster Marauders in a game played in Hamilton on Friday night.

The Blues dominated play throughout and jumped into the lead after only 19 seconds on a goal by Cary Farrell. By the eight minute mark they had upped the count to four and knocked starting netminder Tom Wynne to a position on the end of the bench. He was replaced by Jim Britton.

The Blues treated Britton no better as they pelted the McMaster net with 53 shots. The Blues were paced by a four goal performance from Doug Caines and a hat-trick by Dan D'Alvise. Other scorers were Rob Gemmel, Larry Hopkins, Joe Grant and Dan Tsubouchi.

Dave Jenner faced 27 shots in the Toronto net and was beaten twice by Wayne Dusome and once by Mark Bredin and Tom Jaczenko.

Varsity coach Tom Watt, attributed the high scoring to the fact that the rink was very small. There was not much room between the blueline and the net which led to a lot of shots from close range.

The result of this game however, was drastically different from the last time these two teams met in Hamilton. In that game Wynne played superbly, stopping 50 shots to shutout the Blues.

The win moves the Blues to a perfect 4-0 mark in league play this season. They will put their undefeated streak on the line when they travel to Sudbury next weekend to meet the Laurentian Voyageurs. In their only meeting to date, the Blues downed Laurentian 7-1.

Unrestrained fee hikes ok

By KATHY CANTY

A highly controversial report on Ontario's education problems, written by York University professor John Buttrick, has been attacked on all sides since its release last Thursday.

Buttrick's report, commissioned by the Ontario Economic Council, recommends that the government "push tuition up as rapidly as is politically feasible" to the point where it covers the cost of instruction. It suggests too that each institution charge what it wishes in each faculty or course.

Students should be provided with loans at a market rate of interest. Repayment of these loans should be based on income and capital gains as reported for income tax purposes, on a declining scale, according to Buttrick.

Moreover, grade 13 should be eliminated and secondary schools should offer three-year, full tuition scholarships to 10 percent of their grade 12 students. Each university should provide similar scholarships for graduates of professional study to a proportion of its graduating students, said Buttrick.

The report also recommends that grants to post-secondary institutions be divided into two parts. One part of the money, allotted on a per capita basis, would decline to match the increase in tuition at each institution. The other part would be "based on published research output and public service activities." Finally, estimates of job prospects for people with post-secondary credentials should be made available, according to Buttrick.

Buttrick said in an interview that his proposals would make post-secondary education more equitable. Presently, most university students come from middle-class or wealthy families, he claimed, with the result that the poor subsidize the rich through laxation. Furthermore, "people ought to bear the costs of what benefits them," added Buttrick. Tuition would rise to "maybe a thousand dollars" per year under his system, he said.

Scholarships for bright students would provide students from poorer families and high schools with a better chance of receiving a post-secondary education, said Buttrick.

In addition he felt that information on the employment market would help solve the problem of graduates having to accept jobs inappropriate to their credentials. By paying the cost of their own instruction "students would have more control" over their education. "It would get rid of the lousy teachers," Buttrick said. Eliminating grade 13 would "increase the size of the pool eligible for university" and boost enrolment, he claimed.

U of T president John Evans disagreed. Eliminating grade 13 would produce a "once only increase" in enrolment with a resulting "one year blitz" he said. "After that there is no increase in the pipeline of the system. It might cause a decline in enrolment." Higher tuition "would add an additional impediment" to poorer students hoping to attend university. It wouldn't do anything to correct the unequal representation of wealthier people in universities, said Evans, and it "might make it worse." Buttrick's bursary program would not offset this problem, he stated.

It is "unrealistic" to expect universities to respond to fluctuations in enrolment in different classes every year and charge fees accordingly, said Evans. He was also dissatisfied with the proposal that universities receive part of their funds according to the quality of research at each institution. There are "real differences" in the quality and amount of research done at various universities said Evans, and "the quality of the operations is left out" (of Buttrick's proposal).

Minister of Colleges and Universities Harry Parrott was also unenthusiastic. "I'm not at all interested in direct payments for instruction," he said. Students should bear some of the cost of their own education, Parrott believes, but he would not take this as far as Buttrick. The unequal representation of wealthier people in universities is "more a social problem than an economic problem," he claimed.

Parrott wants to "keep a constant relationship between operating grants and fees." He claimed, however, that "there is room for some adjustment in fees as a total."

"The report has not been studied in the ministry as yet," said Parrott. He stressed that Buttrick's study was made independently of the government. "The minister isn't going to jump every time there is a report." There are "many recommendations in his report that we won't react to at all, ever," said Parrott.

SAC president John Tuzyk was highly critical of Buttrick's program. It would "exacerbate the situation we have now where the people from higher incomes are over-represented in our universities," said Tuzyk.

Miriam Edelson, chairperson of the Ontario Federation of Students, agreed. "Definitely enrolment would have to be lower." Higher tuition would be a barrier to many people wishing to attend post-secondary institutions, she said. It would turn out that only poor people of exceptional ability could attend, Edelson added.

NDP colleges and universities critic Ted Bounsall felt that Buttrick's proposals wouldn't affect the quality of teaching. But he called the increase in tuition "absolutely ridiculous." It is economic elitism at its worst, he said. Tuition fees are the single biggest barrier to university, he said. The proposals for changing the funding scheme of universities would result in the "closure of smaller research institutions," according to Bounsall.

Old GSU building to go

By SHANE PARKHILL

In the major plans being formulated for the redevelopment of part of the U of T campus one student organization is afraid it will be lost in the shuffle. "The university has acted like an indifferent landlord," claims Graduate Students Union (GSU) president Bill Stratton.

His complaint stems from the recommendations of the South-West Campus Task Force, a body set up by the Resources Subcommittee of Governing Council last January 17th to consider the redevelopment of the south-west portion of the campus bounded by Wilcocks Street, Huron Street, Russell Street and Spadina Avenue. Its major recommendation was that the area be given over primarily to the construction of a new Earth Sciences complex.

"From all the talk we've heard we're fairly sure the GSU building will be torn down but we have no guarantee we will be given alternate space," Stratton said. He complained that the graduate student appointed to the task force, Peter Riley, was not a representative of the GSU. No submission was officially requested from them, he added, in marked contrast to the academic departments whose needs were investigated in minute detail. "As far as we know the task force has no idea what operations and services the GSU offers," he said.

Stratton claimed that while attention was given to facilities for health care, job placement and counselling services, the task force ignored "the need to provide a campus life for students at U of T." "We feel that this need, which has been so long neglected by this university, is every bit as important as the question of supplying adequate academic facilities. This fundamental question was totally ignored," he said.

The GSU building contains a bar, restaurant, and gym, and houses the Grad Post and the Graduate Assistants Association.

Stratton maintained that "outside of the GSU building there is no student activities centre on the U of T campus." Tearing down the GSU building he felt, would remove the precedent for student activities buildings on campus, for undergrads and part-time students as well as grad students.

He also criticized the omission of architectural design among the terms of reference of the task force. "We're outside their criteria," he said. He added that the GSU building is probably one of the oldest on campus and the GSU will be looking into the legal question of whether the building could be preserved through the Toronto Historical Board.

"The university wants to destroy the building primarily because they think it is too expensive to maintain," said Stratton.

South-West Task Force chairman M.E. Charles disagreed with Stratton's appraisal of the situation. "I think his perspective is far from an accurate one," said Charles. He pointed out that the graduate student member of the task force encouraged the GSU to make a submission. The GSU did submit a brief indicating they were basically satisfied with their present location.

"No division of the university was officially consulted," he added, saying there were general requests for submissions in the U of T Bulletin and the Varsity in the early spring and again in the Bulletin this fall.

Charles also maintained that student social activities were not neglected by the task force, adding that they were "very much aware of the presence of the GSU on the site." He said the report indicates that if the GSU building needs to be torn down, alternate space should be provided. "There is certainly no intention to deny the GSU proper facilities on campus," he said.

Charles also felt there was still time for the GSU to make further submissions, since the fate of their building has not yet been decided. The task force report will be discussed further at the December 13 meeting of the Resources Subcommittee.

The GSU building on Bancroft may be torn down.

Parrott to come here

Responding to SAC's siren song of OSAP, Minister of Colleges and Universities Harry Parrott has finally agreed to come to U of T and talk loans.

After a succession of letters, phone calls and purveyed requests to meet U of T students, dating from September 19, Parrott's office informed Students' Administrative Council (SAC) president John Tuzyk yesterday of the "possible day" Parrott will speak on the student loan program. There's only one catch — the day is December 22.

Tuzyk, who termed the date "ludicrous," has proposed instead a meeting in early January, pending consultation with the ministry, the Graduate Students' Union and the Association of Part-Time Undergraduate Students, the latter two organizations active with SAC in the effort to have Parrott come to U of T.

Centre: new chance

By BLAIR HUNTER

The Planning and Resources Committee injected new life in the Campus as the Campus Centre project by recognizing a petition from the Students' Administrative Council (SAC) against self-financing of the project. The petition asked the committee to reconsider the administration's two-year-old no-net-cost restrictions.

The committee, however, did not vote on the contentious no-net-cost principle (which forces the project to be totally self-financing) but put off a decision until its next meeting in December.

SAC vice-president Dave Jones said: "We approve of this delay because it gives us time to put forth to the committee a comprehensive brief on the background and specific aims of the Campus as the Campus Centre project."

At Monday's meeting student council member Michael Treacy reviewed the political background of the project emphasizing the basic discrepancy underlying a self-financed campus centre.

"The removal of the no-net-cost principle would put the Campus as the Campus Centre project back on equal footing with other capital cost projects undertaken by the university," explained Treacy.

"There is a fundamental difference between this project and the residences and parking lots which are also expected to be self-financing. In many cases the residences are old buildings paid for long ago and the parking lots obviously have a low operating expense."

Jones presented SAC's audio-visual display to acquaint the committee members with the architectural concepts entailed in the project.

SAC University Government Commissioner Brian O'Riordan told the Varsity that in light of the information presented he feels confident the committee will remove the no-net-cost restrictions.

Committee member William Saywell, Principal of Innis said: "Even if the no-net-cost principle is removed, the administration is committed to nothing in any event many of the Campus as the Campus Centre services (proposed for Sidney Smith Hall) could be incorporated into the South-West Campus redevelopment project."

Saywell also stated the committee will have to be convinced that the walking distance between Sidney Smith and the south-west area of the campus is great enough to actually deter students from using the services should they become available there.

The committee also passed Stewart Lee's motion to accept Option 2 of the administration's Draft Analysis allocation of increased space in the reconstruction of the Sanford Fleming building.

This option leaves the Engineering and Science Library located in the Sanford Fleming building. The location of the university's computer terminal remains unresolved. However, under Option 2 the centre would be consolidated and remain on campus rather than becoming part of an off-campus tri-centre in partnership with Ryerson and York.

14 per cent had no summer jobs

By ERIC McMILLAN

Almost one out of every seven students currently at U of T was out of work for the entire summer this year, according to a Varsity survey.

The survey of 203 students on the St. George campus found 13.8 per cent of those questioned answered "no" to "Did you have a job this last summer?"

Surprisingly, it was easier for females to find work than males, although women's wages were generally lower and they managed to save less money by the end of summer.

Unemployed female students numbered 11.5 per cent while the rate for male students was 13.9 per cent. (A small number of respondents who did not specify gender had a jobless rate of over 23 per cent.)

The average male student worked 11.8 weeks this summer and saved $1,242. Female students worked an average of 12.2 weeks but they saved only $1,040.

One reason for this difference may be the kind of work that is available for students in the summer. Women tended to pick up low-paying positions such as domestic jobs, waitressing, typing and clerical work. Seventeen per cent of women were paid the minimum wage $2.65 or less, compared with four per cent of men at this level.

Although the big money jobs were more difficult to find, they were more likely to go to men. Manual labour jobs such as construction, machine operation, and telephone installation contributed to 31 per cent of males receiving over five dollars an hour. Only 11 per cent of women earned this much.

Among both men and women undergraduates, the jobless rate was higher for students entering first year than for students in other years. Only 14 graduate students filled out the questionnaire, a figure too low to provide reliable generalizations for graduates, although their results are included in the total figures.

Predictably, few students found work in their field of study. About three-quarters of students said that none of the jobs they held over the summer related to their studies. Most of those students who found studies-oriented work are enrolled in engineering or other professional programs.

A further breakdown of the statistics by faculty and program will appear in a future issue of the Varsity.

The survey was carried out by asking students in college and academic buildings on the downtown campus to fill out a 16-part questionnaire. Results are still being analyzed for questions regarding employment services, government job programs, unemployment insurance, parental assistance, job location and hours worked.

What you told us

"The situation is black. When is someone going to tackle, rather than talk about it?" — Civil Engineering student IV.

"If you look for a job hard enough and quit being picky you'll find one." — Phys. Ed. student II.

These are two kinds of responses received when a Varsity questionnaire on summer unemployment asked for general comments.

Angry complaints however, were in the majority and were received both by students who could not find work and those that did.

Another repeated theme was that you need connections to get a job. This was borne out by the high number of successful applicants who listed parents, friends, and just "connections" as their source of leads.

Here are some of the other things students said about their experiences this past summer:

"I deserved unemployment (benefits) but was refused because of an error on UIC's part." — English II.

"It's hard for students to find a summer job simply because most of the companies don't want to waste money or time to train any students." — Arts and Science III.

"Go out and look — jobs are available." — Science II.

"Horrible job market." — Music IV.

"I have found that the biggest mistake a student can make is to admit he or she is a student. Past experience has shown me that employers consider students a cheap source of labor and student placement centres aid in this by telling students to lower their expectations.

"I tell employers I am looking for full-time employment and fabricate the necessary experience, references and work history." — Arts III.

"I had no trouble... but I applied at Christmas." — Science II.

"University is more and more for the rich only." — Anthropology PhD.

"Government programs required too many qualifications (lies) or I was up against over-qualified help (graduates)." — English and Philosophy III.

"OSAP should compensate for the fact that summer jobs are hard to get and pay little." — Occupational Therapy II.

"No job this summer means no school next year." — Science II.

"Develop tastes that are not expensive." — Arts and Science III.

"In so far as I can speak for visa students, the situation is BAD." — English PhD.

"It stinks." — Arts and Science II.

Job talks

The student voice on unemployment will be heard tomorrow by the Ontario Cabinet. Four representatives of the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) have been invited by the Ontario Federation of Labour (OFL) to participate in a colloquium on unemployment between the OFL and the provincial government.

Also present at the meeting will be Students' Administrative Council (SAC) president John Tuzyk, SAC External Affairs Commissioner John Doherty and Graduate Students Union president Leo Casey. The meeting will discuss unemployment problems in general.

Searching for a new president

By SEAN DUNPHY

The question of who will succeed John Evans as President of the University of Toronto is almost as contentious an issue as where Evans will go when his contract expires next June.

The Presidential Search Committee of the Governing Council is unanimously silent on the matter. All committee members interviewed referred the Varsity to Committee Chairman Marnie Paikin or Secretary David Claringbold. The committee, established last spring by U of T's top governing body, the Governing Council, consists of 15 members: Three students, five faculty representatives, two alumni, three government appointees from Governing Council and two administrative appointees. The committee has been deliberating since July, according to Claringbold.

Claringbold said the committee started working with a large number of names (he refused to specify how many), but has narrowed down the list to a "core group." He did not challenge the suggested figure of six.

Claringbold said that when the committee produces its recommendation, (they hope to have a successor chosen by the New Year), the group will probably be unanimous in their decision. He said the committee is looking for "knowledgeable senior academics," preferably with some background in administration.

Knowledgeable sources outside the committee have mentioned three names as possible successors. One of them, Dean of Graduate Studies of James Ham, was nominated in the early stage of committee deliberations when applications were being solicited. University of Guelph President Don Forster, former vice-president and provost to Evans and assistant to Evans' predecessor Claude Bissell, is another strong contender. Also in the running is Steven Dupre, former chairman of U of T's Political Economy Department and former chairman of the Ontario Council on University Affairs.

Dupre said he was unaware of his being nominated for the job. He responded with York University President Ian McDonald's reply in a Globe and Mail article naming him as a possible successor — that he already had a job. Dupre added: "Not only do I have a job, but I have a better job. Being a full professor is better than being a university president."

Forster refused to say whether he had been interviewed by the search committee but stated that he is "quite happy in Guelph." Ham was unavailable for comment.

McDonald could not be reached, but Claringbold said the committee would not "steal talent."

Prof takes action, slams sexism

By JEFF BUCKSTEIN

One of Canada's top female biologists has charged Wilfred Laurier University with discrimination in their hiring practices. She has sent a letter to Harry Parrott, Minister of Colleges and Universities, asking him to appoint a province-wide university ombudsman "to investigate contentious issues and ensure that universities maintain high standards of teaching and research."

Anne Dagg, a researcher in urban wildlife, claims that "without such control the universities may be, and sometimes certainly are, abusing their power and the people's faith in them."

Dagg feels that because she is a woman, Laurier University turned down her application for a professorship in biology when a position was advertised in January 1974, and instead the job went to an "inexperienced" male professor. A scientist for 19 years, Dagg taught at the University of Guelph and Wilfred Laurier in the sixties. She has written four books and has had requests for reprints of her work from over 30 countries.

Dagg complained twice to the Ontario Human Rights Commission and both times her requests for a public hearing were turned down. Richard Taylor, information director at Laurier, noted that the university had been "cleared twice by the Human Rights Commission." He refused further comment.

Dagg has presently hired a lawyer to look into her case and has asked Ontario ombudsman Arthur Maloney to review complaints against the university and human rights commission, in addition to her request to Parrott.

University of Toronto ombudsman Eric McKee said he does not relish the idea of a province-wide university ombudsman. McKee said he handles U of T internal matters only and feels it is better to be an

Eric McKee

"insider." A province-wide ombudsman, he said, would be an "outsider" and McKee said that "the less outside interference there is, the better."

Parrott said there is not likely to be an ombudsman appointed for Ontario universities. "We can't have an ombudsman for all the various sections of a society. You get an ombudsman for the universities, then the farmers will request one, then the bricklayers. It just wouldn't be practical."

CAREY

TRY AGAIN PARROTT

To Harry Parrott: Do you think we're stupid? Do you really think that coming to U of T on December 22 is going to convince students that you care about their problems?

We can agree wholeheartedly with SAC president John Tuzyk: Parrott's announcement is "ludicrous". It's a clumsy attempt to avoid student hostility while at the same time appearing to be concerned about student input.

The move is so blunt it's not even politically astute. There must be far better ways of deceiving students than coming to U of T when everybody is away. The best one can say about Parrott's announcement is that he has read the U of T calendar carefully.

Of course, in a different sense, Parrott's announcement should embolden students. If Parrott is so afraid to meet students that to avoid them he will resort to tricks as low as this one then students can be sure that the pressure they've put on the minister so far has gotten to him.

However we shouldn't let Parrott get away with this one. He should be told simply and clearly that if December 22 is the only day he can spare he shouldn't bother coming.

letters & opinions

Nazi Newsreels

I would like to confirm the first implication in the generous closing sentence to Mr. Harris' salutary letter concerning Mr. Hartt and myself and the facts about Metropolis. It is quite true, as he implies, that I was in no position to challenge the "facts" in Mr. Hartt's piece which Mr. Harris finds so noteworthy in error. I have never consulted the records of UFA studios to find out who was President of the organization when Mr. Lang made Metropolis, nor have I pored over the latest volume from the Berkeley Press of the airline ticket stubs of Fritz Lang from 1919 to the present day.

The only statement in Mr. Hartt's piece that I knew was questionable was "Thea von Harbou was never heard from again." I did not address myself to the trivial question of whether Ms. Harbou was heard from again, for the same reason that I would not have wasted time pointing out the other "errors" Mr. Harris points out in his letter, even if I had substantially more to go on than the word of Mr. Harris against that of Mr. Hartt — I would not have wasted any time mentioning that, simply because so far as my argument was concerned, not one of the "errors of fact" which Mr. Harris so proudly displays had the least bloody relevance. And therefore I deny most vehemently the further implication of Mr. Harris' closing remark, that because I did not pore over library sources for hours and days before writing my reply, I was not competent to make any statement whatever on the issue we were discussing. I have a thorough general knowledge of the history of Metropolis and the reaction to it amongst the Nazis, and this was all I meant to indicate when I indicated that I was familiar with the material Mr. Hartt was discussing.

Moreover, as I have already maintained, not one of the objections raised by Mr. Harris to Mr. Hartt's letter, whether substantiated or not, is in any way related to the argument Mr. Hartt was making or to my reply, or to the very grave questions of freedom of speech and expression raised by the recent protest and the controversy surrounding it. I have by no means always agreed with the people on either side of this issue, but at least these people have always consistently addressed themselves to the issue. They have not wasted space in the paper and the time of our readers picking six specific and irrelevant nits.

I don't really want to keep going on about the Regus films affair, but I do think the recent Trotskyist letter, (which from its length I conclude to be the opening installment of a serialized novel), deserves some sort of reply in brief. First, the characterizations of Robin Holmes and of my colleague Kim Michasiw are beneath contempt; Robin Holmes' letter was fair and exact, and unlike the Trotskyist response did not indulge in name calling or personality smears.

And if Kim's careful, balanced and reasoned remarks throughout this affair are "ignorant", "infantile" and "dishonest", then I wonder what terms are left to apply to the protestors themselves, who ignorantly attack Regus films as fascist, infantile point fingers and call names at those who protest such extremist rhetoric, and dishonestly deny that it was ever their intention to make such vicious and unfounded accusations?

I sincerely do wish to let this matter drop, but I do not believe the organizers of the protest should be let by with the consistently self-righteous and callous disregard for the rights of those they have opposed in this controversy, especially since this most recent letter makes it clear that they have not abated in the coldness, the calculation, or the narrowness of their attitudes one bit.

Drinking age

Has anyone taken the time to consider the implications of having the drinking age in Ontario higher than the legal age of majority? It means that we are placing a greater value on a person's right to consume alcohol than their rights to vote or to enter into legal contracts. This is a serious mix-up of priorities.

Alcohol if only a beverage, is a drink. The right to cast a ballot is the very backbone of a democratic society. Surely the highest form of recognition of an individual's maturity is the acknowledgement of his ability to take a responsible part in the government of that society.

Over-drinking amongst teens is a complex social problem but its solution must not undermine the very fabric of democracy. If a youth has earned the right to vote he must be recognized as mature enough to manage his other responsibilities, including whether or not he should drink.

Personally I feel 18 is an appropriate age for a young person to begin full participation in our society. Properly informed as to their rights and responsibilities, these new adults could actually add stability to the high school environment. On the other hand, should the right to vote and other legal rights be overshadowed by pushing back the drinking age, we would be openly admitting our lack of respect for the judgement of our youth. While they would be called adults, 18-year-olds would be denied the same freedoms of choice that all other adults receive. Resentment and rebellion could only result.

The bill to raise the drinking age to 19 is currently under consideration by the Ontario legislature. I urge concerned citizens of this province to join me in writing to the members of our provincial parliament requesting that the drinking age remain at 18 years; the legal age of majority. It would make more sense for the legislature to propose raising both ages to 19. They at least would have to face the true issue at question here: are we prepared to accept 18-year-olds as mature adults? I believe they too will answer yes, and give the much needed vote of confidence to our youth.

Fee increase the answer to SAC's budgetary problems

A wise man once said, "In a vast majority of cases, no dispute arises when the parties have understood each other."

With the wisdom of this message in mind, I feel it is my duty to respond to recent criticisms levelled by Mr. Michael Treacy on SAC's directors and certain executive members. Judging from the tenor of his letter, Mr. Treacy is obviously concerned with the level of SAC expenditures. Perhaps to his surprise, we at SAC share his great concern. However, judging from the level of his comments, Mr. Treacy is not aware of the progress we have made in revenue increase and cost reduction since his year as SAC Finance Commissioner in '75-'76. Although Mr. Treacy's good intentions are clear, he did manage to misconstrue or omit a few of these points in his letter.

I would begin by noting the obvious exclusion of the fact that this year's council has managed to reduce its absolute overall deficit by approximately $13,000 over last year. This is more than a remarkable feat given inflation, and that the level of service and programming increased somewhat over last year, and vastly over the period of two years ago. Since last year, we have added Campus Weeks, the SAC Newsletter, Info, desks at Sid Smith and Dentistry, U of T Riding Stables, expanded our folk series and free films to suburban campuses, added campus walkabouts for first year students and reinstated Preview Day; all with a substantial net decrease in expenses. Between last year and Mr. Treacy's year our repertoire grew to include weekly pubs (with live, name band, entertainment), folk concerts, ski days, Roam Arounds and Tri-Campus dances, Varsity SAC page, and Campus Sex Ed. Centre.

It is therefore reasonable to say that since '75-'76, the level of services provided by SAC has grown vastly. Mr. Treacy maintains that the administrative expenses have been the primary cause of the increase in our expenditures. However, the reality is that as a per cent of total expenses, the administrative costs have been relatively constant over the recent past and have in fact decreased this year over last (from 25.5 per cent to 24 per cent of total). It is also noteworthy, that at other Ontario university student councils, the administrative expenses account for over 30 per cent of the total and closer to 35 per cent in most cases.

While it is true that some executive salaries were drawn during the month of September, it is incorrect to assume that people were paid for work they did not do. All members who received payments in September were paid wages for work honestly completed throughout the summer months. It was the opinion of SAC's administrator-accountant that it would be much easier from the accounting point of view, to process these cheques at one time, after all work had been completed. Also, there is no reason to believe that the actual year end salaries should approach the $22,000 figure as Mr. Treacy suggests, unless by decision of the board the executive salary account should receive a well overdue cost of living increase.

Mr. Treacy mentioned his particular aversion to SAC representation at provincial and national student conferences. Perhaps he feels that it is a waste of time for the U of T to have a voice on issues of grave concern to the average student. On this issue, I am afraid he stands alone, as it is the consensus of the Board of Directors that these are important matters on which we must be heard. It should be noted that Mr. Treacy made the incorrect statement that our total conference budget was $10,000 when in fact it is just slightly over $7,000 or 1.4 per cent of the total expenses.

From his experience as SAC Finance Commissioner, Mr. Treacy should be well aware of the difficulty of controlling SAC expenditures. The 1976 Memorandum of Recommendations from the External Auditors Report discloses many of the financial control weaknesses that Mr. Treacy neglected to resolve in his year but which he now condemns. Payroll, expenditures and minutes (i.e. expenditure authorization) sub-systems were all identified as problems in the overall SAC financial system at that time. It is no wonder that the ('75-'76) budget targets were off by over $38,000 at year-end, when the system itself was not subject to sensitive controls.

In drawing further comparisons between this year and his own year as Finance Commissioner, Mr. Treacy concluded that there is currently a lack of financial leadership.

I believe what Mr. Treacy would prefer is a financial dictatorship arbitrarily choosing the directions of SAC programming, and not rule by student feedback and consensus. Perhaps the fact that there were no finance commission meetings on record for '75-'76 indicates that Mr.

Treacy favours this sort of despotic financial leadership he speaks of.

The solution to his assertion that administrative costs have grown disproportionately is to fire three employees. As I have previously noted, there has in fact, been no relative growth in these costs at all. And while he feels that firing may be the simple answer to growth, he has not made any formal indication (i.e. motion) to consider such action. The reality is we could not afford to lose employees. The growth of programs has produced the demand for extra ticket sales, promotion and accounting staff. This indicates to me that firing employees is not the answer.

And so, while Mr. Treacy and I share our concern for SAC's tight financial condition, we remain a part on certain basic philosophies. While Michael cares to admit less about his own year as Finance Commissioner, he faced many of the problems we now face today. I maintain that this list of problems has been compounded by growth of services and services support programs. While I never specifically mentioned the option of a fees increase in the article he criticizes, it does look more and more like a feasible solution to SAC's future budgetary problems.

Douglas Robertson

SAC fee increase irresponsible

Tonight the Students' Administrative Council (SAC) decides on whether it needs a student fee increase for its full-time undergraduates. The SAC Executive has passed a motion to recommend an increase. Why is this necessary? Is it inflation, expansion of programs, or increased deficit. No, these are not acceptable reasons. Since the last fee increase in the late sixties, SAC has had profits totalling almost $200,000. This is money SAC collected, did not spend on services, but simply put in the bank to sit and collect interest.

In 1970 this fund was tapped for $8,328 to cover a deficit in that year. Last year's deficit further reduced it by $33,000. Will we ever spend the remainder? We will certainly not if the Board votes for a fees increase tonight.

Why does SAC need this nest-egg (it totalled $226,000 on April 30, 1977 fiscal year-end after the year's projects were completed and paid for)? It allows SAC to pay expenses during the summer before the fees come in the fall.

That's right, SAC holds over $200,000 in the bank most of the year doing nothing just so that in the month before fees arrive they can avoid 'sinfully' borrowing money and the 'inconvenience' of controlling their cash flow as any other well-managed organization must do.

It is ridiculous to ask the students of this university to pay more in fees in order that SAC can buy its way out of its management problems. Further, it is unfair to those students who paid fees in the last eight years that their money is not returned to them in some form of benefit other than collecting a low rate of interest in the bank.

Some Executive members have boasted about the new tight financial and budgeting controls, the expansion of services and programs, and the trimmed deficit budget. Whether one agrees with the present deficit or not, this year's deficit and next year's projected deficit can be met through the accumulated profits of the previous years.

For a moment, assume SAC did go for an increase. The increase suggested is in the order of $3 to $5. Take $4 and multiply by 26,000 students and we get a $104,000 increase. With the projected budget for next year, this means profits in the order of $50,000 in the first year.

It is clearly irresponsible to run to the students for more money when someone whispers 'deficit' or 'inflation'.

How is your SAC Rep going to vote on the compulsory SAC fee? I know how I will vote.

Perspectives: colloque zolien attire assistance internationale

Le centième anniversaire de la première apparition de l'Assommoir d'Emile Zola fut l'occasion d'un colloque ce dernier weekend à Roberts Library. Professeurs, étudiants et chercheurs zoliens de partout dans le monde ont pris part dans les discussions de samedi et dimanche.

L'Assommoir, qui fit son entrée en scène le 24 janvier 1877, est un recueil de vignettes sur les Faubourgs et leurs habitants de la seconde moitié du 19ième siècle. Zola, ayant eu une conscience politique, fut déprimé par le manque apparent de passions politiques visible dans la classe ouvrière habitant les faubourgs, surtout celui de la Poissonnière.

Jeanne Gaillard, professeur-spécialiste en histoire du Second Empire à l'université de Paris, ouvrit le colloque avec une dissertation sur les "réalités ouvrières et le réalisme chez Zola." Elle parla des différences entre les perceptions historiques et sociologiques de Zola et les réalités elles-mêmes. "Des sources diverses montrèrent que la pathologie sociale abondamment décrite par les hygiénistes et les philanthropes de la première moitié du siècle ne s'est pas aggravé sous l'Empire malgré la croissance des villes et celle de l'industrie."

Elle a dit que pour Zola les racines de la déchéance ouvrière ne tiennent pas essentiellement au niveau de vie. Ses observations, ses emprunts à la littérature sociale contemporaine, il les intègre à une philosophie de la condition ouvrière, a-t-elle dit.

Le temps du roman n'est donc pas exactement historiquement bien placé: a-t-elle expliqué Zola a utilisé la poésie pour montrer à la fois la déchéance de l'Empire et celle de la classe ouvrière. Avec l'aide de connaissances de la psychanalyse contemporaine Gaillard a démontré la vitalité ouvrière ayant été interprétée comme déchéance fut en réalité bien plus optimiste pour la condition du prolétariat que ne les voyait Zola.

Gaillard conclut que Zola fut un des premiers français à regarder en face la condition ouvrière et à distinguer la différence entre divisions sociales embryonnaires et maladie de jeunesse de la Révolution Industrielle.

Henri Mitterand, également professeur à l'université de Paris, donna sa dissertation sur "l'Ebauche de l'Assommoir — problèmes de génétique zolienne". Il dit que "l'Ebauche et les Plans de l'Assommoir" peuvent servir pour étudier les aspects généraux de l'engendrement romanesque chez Zola.

Mais "on dégagera ici les composantes plus profonde, moins délibérées, déterminées par des facteurs dont l'auteur n'a pas une claire conscience, ou que refuse l'énoncé de ses principes théoriques: une composante ethnologique, narrative, et rhétorique, où l'on peut déceler un jeu de contradictions et de complémentarités entre la dynamique propre de la langue et le travail d'un discours singulier."

Written Rarities at Fisher

By Peter Hohenadel

Push through the revolving doors at the Thomas Fisher Rare Book Library. Walk past the turnstile and gaze at this unique structure. Five open floors of rare and precious book stored in one great hexagonal room meet your gaze. The atmosphere is quiet and soothing under diffuse light, comfortable in a rigidly controlled atmosphere that keeps temperatures at 72 degrees Fahrenheit and 50 per cent humidity. The Thomas Fisher Rare Book Library was conceived "as a monument to encourage donors to give," according to Richard Landon, director of the Library.

To bibliophiles and academics alike, the Thomas Fisher Rare Book Library is a garden of delight. Originally created as a distinct body in 1955, the Department of Rare Books and Special Collections was at first no more than a small cache of dusty volumes stored in locker cupboards. Today, the collection numbers more than 150,000 volumes, stored and displayed in the Fisher Library, adjacent to Roberts Library.

Shakespeare and Medicine

This elaborate building houses a collection of rare volumes that compares favourably with rare book collections all over the world. Foremost in the prized possessions of the Library is the Fisher endowment, a collection of books pertaining to Shakespeare and the Elizabethan world. This collection includes a set of four of Shakespeare's Folio Editions, of which only 200 copies are extant. The Elizabethan histories that Shakespeare used as sources for his plays, such as those by Halle (1550) and Holinshed (1577) are also a part of the collection. The Library, possesses original copies of Spencer's Fairie Queene (1609) and Chaucer's Works (1561) from the same period.

The Fishers' interest in Elizabethan artifacts extends to the etchings of Wenceslaus Hollar (1607-1677). Elizabethan England's predominant landscape artist. Hollar's bird's eye view of London and Western Europe offers an intimate and accurate description of life at that time, from minute characteristics of Elizabethan dress to the reproduction of architectural monuments (like the old St. Paul's Cathedral) that are no longer standing. Some of these priceless etchings have been framed and are on permanent display in the reading rooms of the Library.

The Hannah Collection, containing medical texts, pamphlets and artifacts, represents another keystone in the library's catalogue. In particular, these ephemera (hastily-printed texts that people most often read and throw away) offer some of the more intriguing glimpses of medical history. One such pamphlet, published by the College of Physicians of the City of London on May 25th, 1665, gives "Certain Necessary Directions, As Well for the Cure of the Plague, As for Preventing the Infection." According to other historical documents of the time, fear of the plague in 1665 was unfounded, and any vestiges of the disease disappeared with the arrival of winter.

Ancient Rarities

Certain volumes at the Rare Book Library reach even further back into history. The oldest printed book at Fisher Library is an edition of Sententiarum libri IV by Peter Lombard, printed in Strassburg and rubricated in 1468. A manuscript entitled Codex Thorntonensis, a Greek translation of the four Gospels, dates back to the eleventh century. Another example of especial rarity is an edition of the Koran, meticulously inscribed and bound in an intricate leather wallet. Although this particular edition of the Koran has been conclusively ascribed to the sixteenth century, it is often difficult to assess the publication dates of Koran volumes. Since Moslem teaching forbids the use of the "graven images" produced by a printing press, handwritten editions are still being produced.

Scientific Collections

Among its scientific collections, The Fisher Rare Book Library possesses the renowned Stillman Drake Collection, perhaps the world's most complete assembly of works by and about Galileo. Drake, a leading authority and biographer of Galileo, is still amassing items for this collection.

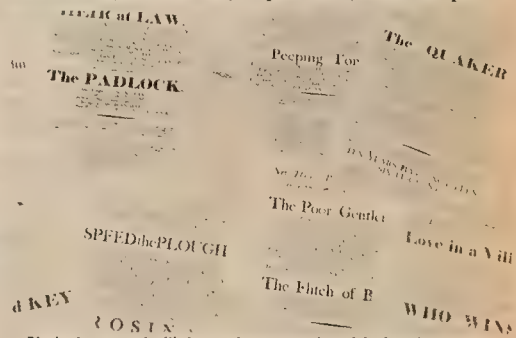

Another important monument to scientific history is the Charles Darwin Collection of the Fisher Library, which contains more than 3,000 items, only a small portion of the total legacy of Charles Darwin, whose prolificacy and eclectic achievement stand unsurpassed in modern science.

Richard Landon displaying one volume in the large

From more recent times, the genius of modern English literature is adequately represented at the library. Special collections of W. B. Yeats and Rudyard Kipling dominate this aspect of the library's illustrated covers painted over in a yellow wash. These little books, which were commonly priced from sixpence to a shilling, reflect the blossoming of a British reading public that followed the spread of coffers, although selected works of authors such as Henry James, Robert Louis Stevenson, T. S. Eliot, Robert Graves and James Joyce are also stored at the Fisher Library.

Yellow backs and Chapbooks

The Fisher Library's collection of "yellow-backs" and "chapbooks" is worth noting. "Chapbooks" were cheaply bound books distributed by hand in the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries. They most often depicted fairy tales, humour and romances, as well as the lives of popular heroes such as Robin Hood and Dick Whittington.

Similar to these chapbooks, "yellow-backs" were a Victorian vogue, short histories bound in vivid public education.

The Fisher Library is particularly concerned with the acquisition and preservation of Canadian literature and memorabilia. The Canadian Collection is remarkably comprehensive, covering the gamut of Canadian literary achievement. The collected papers of authors such as Lampman, D. C. Scott, Atwood, and Newlove are preserved at the Library.

More Canadiana

Consistent with the desire to preserve Canadiana, the Fisher Library has retained copies of significant developments in Canadian publishing. For example, there is the collected output of the Graphic Press, a highly decorative publishing company that thrived in Ottawa during the 1920's and '30's, printing the work of F. P. Grove and others. In a more modern context, the Fisher Library retains all back files of Maclean-Hunter and Southam publishing companies.

Canadian history is represented in the Library's collection by a large body of works relating to Arctic exploration. The search for a Northwest passage is well-documented, featuring early records of the Hudson's Bay Company and the accounts of famous Canadian explorers such as Samuel Hearne and Sir Alexander MacKenzie.

In the annals of recent history, the Fisher Library possesses rare film footage of Sir Frederick Banting, the discoverer of insulin. The collected entury playbills being restored.

papers of Jacob Bronowski have recently been added to the library's collection. Bronowski's tremendous contribution to modern philosophy has yet to be fully appreciated.

Restoration Required

These highly variegated and fragile collections demand sophisticated methods of maintenance and repair. To this end, master bookbinder and restorer Emrys Evans has been employed by the University for the last eight years. Trained extensively at the University of Bristol in England, Evan's work is laborious and complex. His workshop in the Fisher Library contains few power tools or other modern work-saving devices. All of the restorative power is in his skilled hands.

In collaboration with his full-time assistant Wayne Finlay and a freelance binder named Michael Wilcox (who works on the Hannah Collection), Evans' shop repairs less than fifty books per year. Obviously, Evan's work is a painstaking and delicate process, involving not only technical expertise, but also a comprehensive knowledge of binding history, so that these rare volumes can be accurately restored to their original condition.

The Birdsall Collection of Bookbinder's Finishing Tools, an assortment of over 3,000 brass stamps that cover one wall of Evan's workshop, are an invaluable aid to the proper restoration of rare books. The collection was donated to the University in 1968 by the Birdsall family, who had been in the bookbinding business since 1792 in the English town of Northampton. The Birdsall Collection is the most extensive on the continent.

In actual use, the binding tools are gently heated and pressed onto moist leather to make shallow impressions. These indentations are then inlaid with gold leaf. This system of gold or "blind" tooling is known to date from at least the thirteenth century.

The cataloguing and handling of these precious volumes also demands a well-trained library staff. The Fisher Library staff is organized so that one person becomes intimately involved with a specific collection. In this way, the library can provide a detailed knowledge of a certain collection for the convenience of the Library's users.

Success is Research

The criteria of success for the Fisher Library are not the same as those of Roberts Library. For obvious reasons, the Fisher Library cannot judge its value by ordinary statistics of use. Instead, its effectiveness is measured by the quality of research it supports. The Library's eminence in this respect is growing steadily, as the quality of the Fisher Library's collections becomes known in the international scholastic community. The number of books consulted has risen by 25 per cent, according to the most recent annual report.

Usage of the Fisher Rare Book Library is by no means restricted to the upper echelons of academia. Undergraduates may consult the Library's collection, and the general public is welcome to inspect the rare book displays that are always on exhibit in the Library.

For post-graduate bibliophiles, Fisher Library director Richard Landon teaches a course in Rare Books and Manuscripts. Employing practical demonstrations and lectures, Landon describes the means of gathering collections, and methods for restoring and maintaining rare volumes.

As could be expected, the priceless value of these rare books warrants a comprehensive security system. At the Fisher Library, there are three alarm systems and only one exit route: poor odds for the prospective thief. Even in the event of a successful theft, stolen books would be virtually impossible to fence. The world market for rare books is so limited that any "hot" book would undoubtedly be detected.

The Fisher Library has room for at least 250,000 volumes, with the possibility of even further expansion, according to Landon. And though the library's budget for the purchase of rare books has been severely curtailed, the collection continues to grow steadily from donations that follow the death of illustrious alumni of U of T.

Richard Landon also speculated that other Canadian universities may eventually transfer portions of their collections to the Fisher Library for safekeeping. Canada has no more suitable sanctuary for the timeless artifacts of modern civilization than the Thomas Fisher Rare Book Library.

Fisher - 'lion of the bunch'

By PETER HOHENADEL

"I remember when I was a boy, my father used to speak of his grandfather on many occasions," said Sidney Fisher, great-grandson of Thomas Fisher, namesake of U of T's Rare Book Library. "He was obviously the lion of the bunch," Fisher continued. "He made an indelible impression on his contemporaries."

According to Norah Story's historical collection, Mills and Millers of the Humber River, Thomas Fisher was indeed one of the more influential citizens of York in the nineteenth century. Born in 1792 in Yorkshire England, Fisher came to Canada in 1819 as "an immigrant with capital" and bearing the benefit of a good education.

After three years of travel in search of prosperous locations for investment, Fisher settled at King's Mill, on the west bank of the Humber River. Fisher's wife and three children arrived in Montreal from England shortly thereafter. From Montreal they travelled along the Great Lakes to York in a bateau, "sitting on a hard bench that was covered only with an awning and which was surrounded only by boxes and barrels destined for York," according to accounts in Story's collection.

The Fishers arrived at their new home in King's Mill and found it dilapidated from neglect and the frequent flooding of the Humber River. But by 1829, Thomas Fisher had developed King's Mill into a thriving business. He expanded his mill into a nail factory and otherwise established himself as a leading York Merchant, acting as trader, shipper, storekeeper, and innkeeper for his customers.

Unfortunately for Fisher, most of his timber reserve was sequestered by the government to build an Anglican rectory that (according to Story's records) "aroused widespread resentment throughout Upper Canada, where the majority of the population were members of the dissenting denomination." Fisher himself was actively involved in the troublesome expansion of the Church of England at that time.

To compensate Fisher's loss of property, the government granted him 100 acres and a new mill site on the Humber, 1½ miles south of Dundas Street. In a short time, Fisher's mill grew so successful that he soon exhausted what timber land he still owned at King's Mill. He began to float logs down the Humber River, as well as teaming logs from Lake Ontario up Dundas Street to a mill road that his labourers constructed and maintained. According to Sidney Fisher, his great-grandfather employed more than 100 men in his mill at Bloor and the Humber. During this time, Fisher served as a justice of the peace and coroner for the town of York.

After the rebellion of 1837, in which Fisher served as a major of the militia in defence of the Humber bridges, Thomas Fisher used his handsome mill profits for land speculation in the burgeoning town of York. Fisher's investments lost money, and after a severe flood burst the Humber dams in 1850, the miller relegated the failing business to his son. Thomas Fisher died in 1874.

Sidney Fisher recounted his father's impression of their historic ancestor. He remembered a man "of very strong character with a commanding presence. Thomas Fisher always retained the accent of his youth," said Sidney, "the qualities of a High Churchman, Tory, Yorkshireman, and Royalist." Unfortunately, no picture of Thomas Fisher is believed to exist.

One of four Shakespeare Folio Editions donated by the Fishers.

Sidney Fisher and his twin Charles, 69, are historical figures in their own right. During World War II, Sidney worked with Sir Robert Watson-Watt, the inventor of radar. Early in his career, Charles Fisher was an associate of Edwin Armstrong, who developed FM broadcasting.

The Fisher twins have collaborated on many other technological innovations. Their most recent invention is a scheme by which crude oil that cannot be extracted by conventional methods (such as oil trapped in tar sands) is recovered using the heat of underground induction coils. Their proposal is feasible in principle, and both oil companies and government agencies are seriously studying the Fisher plan.

Of course, the modern Fishers are also keen intellectuals and bibliophiles. Their gift to U of T of more than 3,000 rare books represented the seminal collection for the creation of the Thomas Fisher Rare Book Library.

One of the most important of these donations was a set of four of Shakespeare's Folio Editions. These priceless volumes reflect Sidney Fisher's particular interest in the Elizabethan era. In fact, Sidney's knowledge of Elizabethan topography is so extensive that he has proved (at least to his own satisfaction) that the Globe Theatre existed almost 200 feet west of the spot where the historical plaque now stands. According to Fisher, a brewery now occupies the real site of Shakespeare's Globe.

In light of their exceptional achievements, it seems that the Fisher twins better deserve their own names associated with the Library, rather than the name of their mercantile ancestor, Thomas Fisher. Bud Sidney Fisher insists, "We wanted to name it after him. He was the first Fisher here, and we wanted to honour the old man. He was a very remarkable person."

Margo St. James

MARGO ST. JAMES TO SPEAK AT INNIS

On Monday November 28th the SAC Women's Commission will present Margo St. James speaking on "Wages For Housework" at Innis Town Hall, starting at 2 p.m. Admission is free.

Margo St. James is the founder of C.O.Y.O.T.E. (Call Off Your Old Tired Ethics), an organization that is working for both the decriminalization of prostitution and wages for housework.

The SAC Women's Commission does not necessarily endorse the views of Ms. St. James.

ALL YOU CAN HANDLE: SAC ENTERTAINMENT

It's getting more and more difficult to avoid finding something of interest for yourself, what with the SAC Service Commission working so hard to bring you top notch movies and entertainers.

This Friday another powerful group of musicians arrives at the Dr. John's Pub in the U.C. Refectory. The Dutch Mason Blues Band will swing into action starting at 8:30 p.m. Price of admission is only one dollar, with beer and plenty of dancing space available.

Taxi Driver, nominated for two Academy Awards and starring Robert DeNiro, will arrive tomorrow at Erindale College, Room 292 at 5 p.m. and then go on to Scarborough College on Friday in Room 216, starting at 7 p.m. On Saturday, November 26th, it will settle at the Med Sci Auditorium downtown at 7 p.m. Part of the SAC Cinema Gratis presentation, Taxi Driver is free of charge. So come on out to watch a great movie set in New York and with something to say about contemporary violence, politics and big city sexual mores.

LOOK IN THE DIRECTORY

The SAC 1977-78 Directory, filled with the names, addresses and phone numbers of students at the University of Toronto, will be out and available for sale at the end of this week. As it is the only listing of its kind, this 200 page digest fills a vital student need. The Directory's "On and Off Campus Classified" contains essential (and some not-so-essential) numbers, including the number of the Office of Admissions, an Astrologer, and up to date listing of the SAC Board of Directors and Student Council Presidents.

Included in this year's Directory are some light-hearted drawings and a short note from Professor Marshall McLuhan.

On sale now for only fifty cents at all SAC locations, the SAC 1977-78 Directory is a must.

— THANKS — BLOOD CLINIC A GREAT SUCCESS

The SAC-sponsored Red Cross Blood Donor Clinic at the beginning of November was the best clinic ever held at the U of T.

Over 2,000 people attended the clinic and close to 1,800 pints of blood were collected. Dentistry was the top contributor per capita, followed by Medicine and Physical and Health Education.

The Clinic was an impressive showing of good feelings. A hearty "well done" to all who took part.

Students respond on Sadat

By PHILIP LIBMAN

Student reaction to Egyptian President Anwar Sadat's trip to Israel as judged by an arbitrary sampling of students in Robarts on Monday night, is best summed up by Laila Klein (UC III) who termed it as "mind-boggling."

Most students interviewed agreed with the opinion expressed by Simon No (New IV): "I think it's great. It's a step toward peace. Everybody has to take initiative, and it is good that Sadat took the first step. At least we have some hope on the situation."

Martin Burg (School of Social Work I) said: "You really can't solve these things unless you talk to each other. This is the beginning for eventual peace. It is also important to note the tremendous way Sadat was greeted in Egypt after he came back."

But not all students agreed with this assessment. Sa'ad Saidullah, president of the Indian Students Association, felt: "It was a great PR job. One doesn't know who is going to use the occasion more usefully for future propaganda. There was PR on both sides, and I think there is an unbridgeable gap between the two sides."

A graduate student in educational theory was also negative. "I think Sadat humiliated himself and the Arabs. He stabbed the Arabs in the back and didn't consult his Arab colleagues who have supported him all these years. Sadat is going to create serious cracks in Arab unity, which will make a lasting peace with Israel impossible in the near future because of the squabbles. Also I don't think the Israeli position has changed. It is still intransigent."

Another graduate student in educational theory agreed with her colleague. "This was certainly not in the interest of Arab unity. If they overthrow him or assassinate him, he deserves it. He sold out to the American dollar. He's a prostitute."

But Sam Henein (Meds II), a student born in Egypt, expressed differing views. "It's a good move Sadat made. He faced people who were considered to be his enemies and in that sense it took courage to seek peace so avidly. I don't know how much will be accomplished, but the visit was an accomplishment in itself. I was impressed by the Israeli reaction, the security arrangements and the friendliness to him. It was great that Sadat and Begin met on friendly terms. But I'm sorry of the widespread disapproval of other Arab countries."

Ellen Adelberg (Innis IV) said, "In terms of getting a precedent of opening lines of discussion, hopefully this will be significant. But Arab reaction was so hostile, they can't muster support for an over-all settlement. Basically, I was really startled."

Sue Golding, graduate student in political economy, however, was exultant. "I think it is a really important historical moment. I hope they'll make the most of it."

Susan Leston (New IV) agreed. "It was a step in the direction towards peace."

"Basically it was a good move which was long overdue," said Frank Wilson, Chiropractic College. "Sadat is committed to world opinion now so something should happen with it."

A dentistry student said: "I think anything towards peace on this planet is a step forward. And I don't think we could regress from where we are right now."

An Israeli student related that "my mother phoned Israel, and was told that the whole country is at a standstill. They are all talking about how fantastic it was."

"It was a landmark in the movement to a final and just peace," said Steve Krashinsky (Law II). "The mere fact of Sadat's going to Jerusalem and implicitly recognizing the existence of Israel and saying so in the Knesset is an extremely important concession on his part. If Israel seeks to preserve moderate leadership in Egypt it is fundamental that Begin make a concession in substance which will match Sadat's concession in form. Israel is a vibrant democracy and there is bound to be enormous public response and accompanying pressure on Begin to make concessions."

Jack Hope, President of the Toronto Student Zionists, said, "I think it's super. Hopefully this will lead into a gameplan to Geneva. If not, bi-lateral peace is conceivable. The trip shows up the rest of the Arab world as unwilling to make peace, and will clarify where world opinion should go. It shows the definite line between moderates and hawks. I believe Sadat is sincere, and that he is a 'mensch'. I believe this is a serious attempt for peace in the Middle East."

Faisal Sa'ab, past president of the Arab Student Association could not be reached for comment on Monday evening or Tuesday and George Sawa, secretary-treasurer of the Association was also unavailable for comment.

Chuck Bogue, part-time student, said "It is still too early to tell what will result from Sadat's visit. It seems significant however that the first concrete move toward peace in the area has been made by an Arab leader, which represents an enormous concession towards peace. Now it is up to Israel to demonstrate that it wants peace, a desire that can be shown not only by its willingness to return occupied lands but by its recognition of Palestinian national rights."

Architect new principal at UC

By CAROLINE CONNELL

The importance of the college system within today's huge university was the keynote to Peter Richardson's inaugural address Monday afternoon when he was installed as the third principal of University College.

Speaking to a capacity audience in UC's West Hall, Richardson expressed the need for a reassessment of higher education goals. He said the current emphasis on marketable training is undercutting the university's primary task — educating people capable of making effective decisions in a variety of situations.

To remedy this, Richardson suggested a renewed emphasis on "solid liberal education" and called for a reversal of the trend towards departmentalization within the various faculties. Colleges would be important in this process, he said, as cohesive scholarly communities and as centres for the liberal arts. He cited University College in this context, a teaching body of the U of T in 1853, as it is neither a federated nor a constituent college and enjoys an impressive history of academic excellence. Richardson is optimistic about the future of the college in spite of financial and governmental difficulties.

After Richardson's declaration of office, administered by U of T President John Evans, he was robed in the traditional principal's gown. Evans' own address emphasized the need for strong college leadership. He said that Richardson was well-suited to lead UC through this controversial period, citing his "unique qualifications, extraordinary versatility, and valuable experience." He quipped that the new principal's skill in antique restoration could save the college some money in its renovations.

Richardson, holder of a Bachelor of architecture from U of T in 1957, a Bachelor of Divinity from Knox College in 1962, and a PhD from Cambridge in 1965, has been a practising architect, a professor at Loyola in Montreal, and a minister of Knox Church, Toronto. He succeeds Dr. A. C. H. Hallett, who served from 1970 until July of this year.

The referendum on a Students' Administrative Council (SAC) fee increase this spring moved one step closer to reality as the SAC executive voted 7-2 Monday night advising the student council to hold one.

SAC president John Tuzyk, the main proponent of the increase, informed the executive that "there hasn't been a fee increase since 1968 and the surpluses of previous years have been turning into deficits. The deficit this year will be $20,000 plus the increase in union salaries. Our minimum cash balance reserve of $70,000 will be depleted in two years given 6 percent inflation, which will cost us an additional $18,000 per year. I'm worried about our margin of safety."

Tuzyk cited the spectre of declining enrolment as a basis for an increased fee. He also felt there would be opposition to cutting back or excising present programs and projects.

"We have attempted to use as many other sources of revenue as possible. The student directory will cost 50 cents, whereas last year it was free. SAC ski days pay for 90 percent of their costs. We are even starting to charge a dime for the coffee in the SAC office."

Tuzyk saw the choice as one of cutting services or raising fees. The future financial health of SAC depended on its financial independence and solvency, he said.

Tuzyk noted that "all the executive members agree on raising the fee. It is just a matter of when." SAC Communications Commissioner Doug Gerhart agreed with this last point. Gerhart voted against the motion: "There must be an organizational halt to growth and activities. SAC must re-evaluate the cost of growth, its infrastructure of administration and procedural matters in finance."

"Until we have that position clearly defined, we should adopt a stand-pat pattern."

Gerhart said the fee increase is unnecessary at present. He argued that SAC's large cash reserve could be more effectively used in programming or invested in a pub.

He suggested that the referendum be voted on this year, with the possible fee increase to go into effect in two years time. This will allow for the proper planning on how to spend the money, and in the meantime will wither down our large surplus.

Volleyball Team Smites Foes

By SANDY GRANT and GLYNIS PETERS

The Women's Volleyball team emerged from the York Invitational Tournament this week-end undefeated in four matches. The Tournament gave the Blues the opportunity to test some of the opposition they will soon face as their season moves into full swing.

U of T's first match on Friday was against a rather weak Ryerson squad. Scores were 15-11 and 15-6 with U of T leading for the entire game and showing strong serves and spikes. The games were fairly relaxed but the team maintained an effort and put on a fine display. Blues came into the second match of the day against Trent with a relaxed attitude after an easy first game and a good dinner! They dominated the first game as the final score of 15-4 indicates, but letting up on their strong attack Toronto fell behind 6-0 at one point in the second match. The Blues came back to take the game 15-11, but they learned that you can't take any team for granted.

On Saturday Carleton took the Blues to three games before Toronto finally pulled together. The first game saw strong serves and some hard pressing at the net to give Toronto a 15-10 victory. A poor display as compared to the games of the previous day and a lack of cohesion resulted in a victory for Carleton with a score of 15-12. Carleton again dominated the play for half of the deciding match and was leading 8-2 at the halfway mark. Rookies Diane Boonstra and Jan Anderson along with captain Louise Scott led a come back effort that pulled the Blues ahead and won them the match 15-9.

Coming off the near loss to Carleton the Blues turned in a superior display against Laurentian in the final match of the tournament. Setters Kristi Varangu, Jane Evernden and Cathy Pogor set up some powerful plays that were finished off by well-placed spikes and tips. In this game, U of T showed their finest effort of the week-end. Again, however, they eased up on their attack in the following game and although still managing to control the game, the final score of 15-13 indicates the difference in play.

Summing up, U of T won all matches this week-end and were thoroughly tested in many aspects of play. Coach Julie Andruchiw is ready for some exciting play in the near future as the team seems to be in for a good season.

The four victories this week end will improve the Blues standings in the league. This year they are in a tier that includes Laurier, York and Guelph. The top two of these teams advances to the semi-finals where two more teams are selected to go on to the finals. This Thursday the Blues travel to Laurier and December 1 they host their first home game against York. Good Luck ladies!

Campbell Preps Swimmers For New Year

sports

Side Line By-Line

By JIM O'LEARY

If there is one factor that has been constant in athletics in Canadian universities in the last 20 years it would be growth. With university expansion in the sixties came growth in the number and quality of athletic programs across the country.

There is no better example of the progress college sports has made than the College Bowl. Since its creation in 1965 the College Bowl has grown to become the largest and most prestigious university event in the country. College Bowl week, with its Schenley and All-Canadian awards, banquets, TV coverage and charitable functions shows the remarkable growth that has taken place over the last few years.

Despite the fact that college sports are booming and getting more recognition, it is time for the bodies who run intercollegiate sport in this country to re-evaluate their methods and objectives. When college sports has reached the point that some coaches will prevent Canadian athletes from participating in their own programs by bringing in Americans to make their teams more competitive, it is clear that something has gone wrong.

The use of Americans is no where more evident than in basketball. Against Laurentian two weeks ago, the Blues were defeated by three Philadelphians who had been recruited to bolster a weak team. The use of Americans has become widespread in recent years. York boasts of a six-foot 10-inch centre from Princeton, while Waterloo has become notorious in recent years for their December airlift of basketballers from south of the border. On the east coast the situation is even worse.

The influx of Americans seems to represent a dangerous change in philosophy for Canadian Universities. In the United States, college sports is governed by a "win at all cost" attitude. Sport there is run very businesslike, putting coaches and players under extreme pressure to win.

This system is supported by expensive recruiting and scholarship programs which often neglect what is best for the student. The atmosphere is very competitive and pressure-packed which often forces students to turn to stimulants to make them perform at peak efficiency. The week before big games is spent investigating a team's injuries, strengths and weaknesses in order that a betting line can be established. Big money changes hands every week, especially on the big sports like football and basketball.

While Canadian programs are still a long way from their American counterparts in terms of the "win at all cost" attitude, there is evidence which indicates we are heading that way. American basketball players in Canadian universities is only a small component of this evidence. The real problem is the circumstances which motivate Canadian coaches to seek out American talent.

Under Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union (CIAU) rules, each university is allowed three American players on their basketball team. In order to be competitive, the smaller universities are forced to go out and recruit three imports.

The CIAU is made up of 46 universities across the country; most of which are not very big and therefore favor rules that would make them more competitive with larger institutions. These smaller schools were also instrumental in changing the transfer rules which made it possible for an American to transfer to a Canadian university without a penalty. Under the old rules, a student had to sit out one year of intercollegiate competition if he switched schools. The result of these rules is that sports in Canadian universities are emphasizing winning more than competition and fair play.

On the surface it may seem fairly simple to correct these problems. If the transfer rules were changed back so that a penalty was imposed on transfer students, only those Americans really interested in an education would be coming to our schools. While this solution would solve the American problem, it would be unfair to Canadian students who wish to change schools and is therefore unacceptable.

Another solution might be a total ban on American students in CIAU sports. This solution is also faulty however, in that a legitimate student should be able to compete in the university's sporting programs, regardless of his place of birth. Only those American athletes who use school as a pretext to get into intercollegiate sports should be banned.

In order to find a solution it is necessary to strike at the root of the problem. The problem really stems from the fact that smaller universities are forced to compete with larger ones. It is ridiculous to think that a school with a population of under 3,000 can compete with an institution of 20,000, unless they resort to what must be questionable recruiting practices.

The answer therefore, lies in a realignment within the CIAU. Smaller schools should be separated into a league of their own where they will be able to compete with each other without having to bring in ringers from abroad. Once the incentive to recruit Americans is gone, it can be expected that universities will settle down and play with the talent they have on hand.

It would unquestionably be difficult to get such a realignment accepted by CIAU members. A small school such as Acadia would undoubtedly oppose dropping into a second division in light of the success they have had in the last few years. College Bowl appearances bring a small university immeasurable prestige and exposure which can quickly be converted into dollars.

If Canadian universities are to escape the fate of their American counterparts however, they will have to act soon. Now it is mainly the smaller universities that recruit; in the future the larger schools will undoubtedly become more involved and the unique nature of Canadian college sport will be lost.

By HUGH STUART

In the last twelve years the U of T Swim Blues have won ten Canadian championships and been runners-up twice. But coach Robin Campbell warns that it has become increasingly difficult for the team to repeat the success that it has enjoyed in the past. While this year's team is just as talented as those of previous years, the problem is that the programs of other universities have improved tremendously. In fact, in capturing the Canadian championship last season, the University of Waterloo served warning that they will supply some tough competition for the Blues in the future. York University has also emerged as a major contender and only lacks the depth necessary to seriously challenge the Warriors and the Blues.

Last Saturday's relay meet at Wilfrid Laurier University provides a good illustration of Campbell's belief. In the last decade, all the Blues had to do to win such relay meets was to show up. While the final team scores have not been tabulated as yet, Waterloo and York took enough races from the Blues to put the outcome in doubt.

This year's team is basically the same as last year's crew and certainly has the ability to regain the Canadian championship. Heading the list of returnees is the man that Campbell considers to be the best swimmer at the university; Dan Thompson. Thompson is ranked tenth in the world in the 100 meter butterfly and at the World Student Games at Sofia this summer he brought home two silver medals. Blues' team captain Rick Madge was also on the Canadian team at Sofia and in this pair U of T has as fine a tandem as can be found on a university team in Canada.

With the loss of Joe Wright, Geoff Brown, and George Gross, U of T lost some good swimmers, but it appears that Campbell has come up with some fine new talent. The man competition. It is quite possible that this season's Blues' schedule will prove to be too demanding. Before Christmas there is a meet against eleven ranked University of Michigan. After Christmas the team has meets scheduled against the Pointe Claire Swim Club that is ranked third in Canada, Colgate, Waterloo, and a meet at Indiana against a Hoosier team that is ranked in the top half dozen teams in the United States.

So what are the prospects for the 1977-78 season? With a couple of reservations they are very good. One of these reservations concerns the performances of the divers. Last year Waterloo was able to wrestle the championship from the Blues on the strength of the superior performances of their divers. Diving has been a U of T weakness and both Campbell and diving coach Skip Phoenix hope that the Blues' top diver, Helder Vieira, can squeeze past one or both of the Waterloo divers. The other reservation is in regard to the fact that the Canadian championships will be contested in a pool that is measured in meters. The Blues practice in yard measured pools and this causes problems similar to those of the basketball Blues who had to practice in the tiny Hart House gym but competed in the larger Benson Building gym. However a cry of sour grapes is not justifiable as other teams such as Waterloo are in the same predicament.

So, it looks like a dogfight between the Blues, Waterloo and York. The final outcome may be so close that coaching decisions decide the victor. If such is the case, Robin Campbell's experience gives the Blues a decided edge and U of T may end the season with their eleventh championship in thirteen years.

Equestrians Clear First Hurdle at Mac

By ADAM KNELMAN-OSTRY

With the upcoming creation of a riding club and the inspiring performance of the equestrian team at the intercollegiate dressage and stadium jumping championship at McMaster last weekend, horsemanship is on the rise at the University of Toronto. After a close struggle for the team championship, Toronto fell at the hooves of a powerful York squad on the final day of competition. Adam Conyers, turning in a first place performance in Saturday's dressage competition, narrowly missed becoming the event's individual champion.

Despite an unfavourable drawing for horses, Conyers displayed great all-round ability throughout the show. In the stadium jumping championship, Sue Ferguson came through for the Blues with a second, missing first by only seconds. Captain of the team, Geoff Vernon, although hampered by the small size of his mounts and a costly misinterpretation of the rules, still managed seventh place in stadium jumping. Cam Thomson, named the event's Most Distinguished Rider, and Mary "Squeaky" Saunders showed good potential and gained valuable experience for future shows. The team, although newly-formed, showed good horsemanship and excellent spirit and will be preparing for future competitions at the U of T stables at Scarborough College.

Playoffs Near For Lady Cagers

By BARB GROCHOWSKI

Regular season play in the Interfaculty Basketball League has ended, and playoff positions have now been decided. During the season both leagues showed marked improvement over previous years in their skill and performance levels, and as a result many of the games have been worthwhile watching.

In the "A" or competitive division, League 1 had Scarborough leading in points, boasting an undefeated record, until Monday night. At the beginning of the evening, PHE I and St. Mike's were tied for second, but then PHE met Scarborough in the last game of the season, and the jockeys came out on top by the score of 26-21. It is rumoured that the several rather well-conditioned members of the IC field hockey team, playing for PE, helped them outrun the opposition.

The win put PHE I in first place and Scarborough in second, setting the scene for a possible rematch in the playoffs. SMC found themselves out by one point, which can be traced back to a mid-season default to Scarborough.

The two winners now prepare to play against REHAB 'A' and VIC 'A', the two top teams in the other division of the 'A' league. REHAB has an undefeated team, making them the only squad with a perfect record. It will be interesting to see whether they can keep up their success when they play in the playoffs next week.

PHE I will be up against VIC 'A' (Benson Building). Star will play REHAB 'A'.

The 'B' or recreation division sees playoff competition developing among Engineering and Forestry, who gained 2 points on Monday, and two of Pharm 'B' Meds, and New 'B', from Division 2 of the same league. These teams will also be cross-matched to decide the 'B' champion.

Therefore, the week of playoff competition at the Benson Building next week should prove interesting as well as very competitive.

SAC to ask students for fee hike

By GEORGE COOK

This spring U of T students will be given the chance to decide whether or not they want their SAC fees to go up.

At a meeting of the Students' Administrative Council (SAC) Wednesday night the student reps voted 18 to 17 with 2 abstentions in favor of holding a March referendum on a fees increase.

No figure has yet been proposed. "What we do is up to the wisdom of the council," SAC Finance Commissioner Doug Robertson said.

It could be a marginal fees hike to guarantee SAC won't have to borrow money during the summer or "a substantial increase for increased programs," he added.

Engineering representative Tom Simpson, who opposed the referendum motion, said the close vote showed there are a large number of people who don't want a fee increase next year. "Since the last fees increase we've had a surplus. When are we going to spend it?" he asked.

SAC University Governing Commissioner Brian O'Riordan, Vice-President David Jones and Communications Commissioner Doug Gerhart were the only executive members to oppose the referendum motion. Gerhart said the vote showed there is "no broad consensus" among SAC reps on the issue.

SAC president John Tuzyk cited inflation, increased spending for SAC programs, declining enrolment and SAC's $20,000 deficit as reasons for asking students for more money.

Gerhart said a fees increase was not yet required. "Let's whittle down our surplus and then go for an increase," he said.

SAC holds about $226,000 in the bank. This "surplus" is reduced to approximately $70,000 before fall fees are received by SAC in November of each year.

Proposals for an increase will be discussed by the SAC executive during the Christmas break. A recommendation on the exact amount to be asked for in a referendum will go to the council in January, according to Gerhart.

Student federation backs labor's brief on gov't employment

By ANDREW MAHON

"Labor is putting across a position which students are supporting," said Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) chairperson Miriam Edelson yesterday after a colloquium between the Ontario Federation of Labor (OFL) and members of the Ontario government.

Edelson said "students had presented briefs at a number of forums around the province" to help the OFL prepare a 33-page brief on unemployment which was presented to the government at the colloquium.

OFS members and Students' Administrative Council (SAC) president John Tuzyk were present at the colloquium at the invitation of the OFL.

Premier William Davis and cabinet members listened for two hours as OFL officials presented the brief and made some harsh comments concerning the government's response to continuing unemployment in Ontario.

"We are here today because we are deeply perturbed about the serious economic crisis facing this province and the country as a whole," said OFL president Clifford Pilkey as he read excerpts from the brief.

"Manpower policies and training programmes should be developed and co-ordinated to bring jobs and people together," continued Pilkey, who cited a number of recommendations including "scrapping" the anti-inflation board.

Davis expressed appreciation of the brief's conclusions but viewed the problem as a "certain lack of confidence which Canadians seem to have in dealing with the economic crisis."

Davis didn't comment directly on the brief but allowed his cabinet members to clarify some parts of the brief that "were not quite factual."

After the colloquium Tuzyk said he was "pleased" that OFL highlighted the problem of graduates whose skills are not employable.

According to Tuzyk the government should be "looking at better ways of utilizing these skills rather than trying to limit enrolment."

$6 fee hike

The Internal Affairs Committee approved a six-dollar incidental fee hike for university health services Monday night. Beginning next September full-time students will pay $18.50.

The recommendation of the Health Services Working Group, tabled on October 18, passed after a prolonged debate by a vote of 7-1.

Ministry refunds late tuition fine

By GEORGE COOK

If you paid service charges last year for late tuition fees because the Ministry of Colleges and Universities (MCU) failed to process your OSAP application in time, you may be entitled to reimbursement of those charges.

This comes as a result of the annual report of the university ombudsman, Eric McKee, presented to Governing Council on October 31 of this year. In it McKee reveals that MCU accelerated transfer payments to Ontario universities last November to cover increased costs due to the payment of emergency loans for students whose OSAP cheques were late.

In U of T's case the accelerated transfer payment amounted to $1,501,000, plus $45,000 of interest income.

U of T president John Evans said he didn't know of the accelerated transfer payment or of the decision to let late charges stand until the matter was brought to his attention by McKee about a month ago.

"I believe the university should have made more of an effort" to defer or annul late charges to students whose OSAP cheques were late due to the computer problems at MCU, Evans said.

On November 17, 1977, Evans issued a statement to Governing Council directing the university to reimburse eligible students.

Last November MCU sent a letter to U of T encouraging it "to exercise its own initiative in, insuring that students did not experience avoidable hardship" due to difficulties in processing the OSAP applications.

Patrick Phillips, Director of Student Awards, told The Varsity (Jan. 21, 1977) that the university had "adequate funds" to cover the $8,000 worth of emergency loans made at the time. The accelerated transfer payment wasn't used for emergency loans, he said.

The letter from the ministry encouraged the university to defer fees and provide emergency loans. MCU acknowledges that "some expense and some inconvenience" were involved.

At the time the university decided to let the service charges stand because of the administrative difficulty of deciding which of the approximately 13,000 students on OSAP were eligible for a rebate, according to Vice-President of Business Affairs Alex Rankin.

"However we are going to go through all that now. We're going to try to do the impossible," he said.

Rankin went on to say that MCU "grossly over-reacted" to the situation.

Asked if he thought MCU did over-react, Minister of Colleges and Universities Harry Parrott said: "There was no other way. We just did as much as we could."

The university will attempt to contact students who are eligible for a rebate, according to Phillips. He added, however, that the detailed procedure for submitting claims to the university has not yet been established.

Students are eligible for redress provided that their OSAP application was received by the Office of Student Awards by September 1, 1976; that they were assessed service charges exceeding the $12 covered by OSAP; and that the net amount claimed exceeds $2.00.

McKee's report covers the period from October 1, 1976 to September 30, 1977, and deals with the activities of the ombudsman's office.

The majority of requests for assistance came from students concerned with examination procedures, academic regulations, transcript issues, advanced standing and delays in petitions.

The petition process for grade reviews is an area of major concern in the report. It states that the present system appears to offer relatively little satisfaction to students.

The procedure for enforcing the academic discipline code is also touched on. "In my view," McKee writes, "the process is simply not commensurate with the issues it is meant to decide." The report goes on to say that a procedure modelled on the academic appeal system might be preferable.

A review of the academic discipline code carried out by Robin Ross, Vice-Principal of Erindale College and Special Advisor to the Provost regarding the Academic Discipline Code, has just been completed. Procedural changes to make the process simpler are forthcoming, according to Ross.

Prof suspended after York battle

York University social sciences lecturer Jeffrey Forest was indefinitely suspended from his job and banned from the campus Monday after a series of incidents on the campus which started last Thursday. The suspension and banning are pending the decisions of inquiry being organized by York president H. Ian MacDonald.

Forest along with two other supporters of the York Student Movement (YSM), the York University wing of the Communist Party of Canada (Marxist-Leninist) (CPC N-L), and a fourth person were arrested on various charges last Friday.

The literature table of the YSM was also banned on Friday but reinstated yesterday although Forest cannot now obtain a permit for the table.

Heated discussion broke out last Thursday at the regular literature table of the YSM in York's Central Square over the sale of the book "Zionism is Racism" which regularly appears on their table. Some students charged that the book incites racial hatred against Jewish people. According to Empey, vice-president of University Services for York's Student Council (CYSF), tempers flared when a CPC (M-L) poster above the table was torn down.

In an interview with Barbara Ann Nunn, a member of the support staff at York and a supporter of the YSM and one of the arrested said that "a Zionist launched provocations against the literature table" and herself. Large crowds then began to gather.

On Friday YSM members came back to set their table up. According to Brian Johnson of the Excalibur, York's student newspaper heated discussion was followed by a fight. Metro Police were called in and Forest as well as Nunn and two others were arrested.

On Monday when YSM supporters arrived in Central Square to set up their literature table York security guards were on the scene according to students. YSM members at the table were given notice at that time of a ban on their table for that day and notice of suspension of Forest from his job and his dismissal from the campus, said Forest in an interview.

Crowds gathered again as Forest spoke against the attacks on students' democratic rights "to disseminate and participate in Marxist-Leninist, revolutionary, progressive and democratic politics," he said.

According to Varsity reporter Eric Starkman, Monday's incident, unlike Friday's when violence broke out and arrests were made, the police simply made a plea to those gathered to move on. According to students interviewed, the police threatened to arrest them if they refused. However, many students stayed while discussion continued on Zionism, freedom of speech and the presence of the police on campus. Forest was offered another place to continue discussion, according to the Excalibur and police reports.

Hundreds of signatures have been collected on a petition being circulated by supporters of YSM and other students, according to Marsha Forest, social science lecturer and supporter of YSM. The petition demands the immediate reinstatement of the YSM table and the immediate reinstatement of Jeffrey Forest to his job with full rights and privileges.

Another petition, initiated in the offices of Council of York Students Federation (CYSF) on Monday, calls on "some measure of control" to be employed in allowing "certain political groups" to present their views on campus, according to the Excalibur, the York university student newspaper. The paper also reported a third petition also being circulated by a group named "The Eyes of Israel" calling for an end to the Marxist-Leninists giving their views and selling their literature on the campus. It quoted the criminal code subsection concerning public incitement of hatred and accused the YSM of venging "hate literature."

Approximately 80 students, faculty and staff attended an organizational meeting on Wednesday to discuss the recent day's events and pass resolutions calling for an immediate reinstatement of the YSM literature table and for lifting the ban against Forest and for his immediate reinstatement to his job with full rights and privileges.

The YSM literature table was set up on Thursday, but no incidents occurred amidst the many discussions and arguments that took place around and near the table.

Senator Michael Yeats, son of the poet. Sean MacBride will also be present to make the toast to Canada. The son of poetess Maude Gunn, MacBride is a Nobel and Lenin Peace Prize winner, and is the Assistant Secretary General of the United Nations.

According to O'Driscoll, the symposium will provide "a comprehensive exploration of the consciousness of the Celt; his reconciliation of matter and spirit; his self-possession; acceptance of the conditions of life, abandonment to impulse and emotion, indifference to death, and his elevation of the poetic and heroic as models of human behavior."

Celtic studies, until this point, have been largely confined to esoteric probings within the context of a specific field, according to Anne Dooley, secretary of the Celtic Arts. One of the aims of the symposium is to analyze "the Celtic heroic aesthetic" in a comprehensive way, through a gathering of experts in many fields.

Canada's own Celtic dimension is a significant factor to be explored. According to O'Driscoll, "the circumference of one civilization becomes the centre of the next and the resurgence of the Celtic spirit in the 20th century suggests that both Yeats and Spengler were right in their contention that history operates in cycles of 2,000 years

Where will Socrates ramble?

In a meeting Monday afternoon between Royal Ontario Museum (ROM) director James Cruise, representatives from Trinity College and Students' Administrative Council (SAC) vice-president Brian Hill, exact details of the Philosophers' Walk access route to the ROM renovations were revealed.

SAC Trinity rep Malcolm MacKenzie related that the road, running parallel to the walkway, will be "12 to 16 feet wide and black-topped." A bridge, built one foot above the bridge leading to the Edward Johnson Building, won't touch the present bridge but will obstruct it, MacKenzie said.

The access route, in effect for the 2½ years of the first phase of construction in the ROM's south court, "is not the best route" MacKenzie said. "Once the trucks start rolling the law library and music rooms on the west side of the building will be virtually unusable."

The final decision to use the Walk was made by ROM Project Director Henry Graupner and U of T Physical Plant Director William Lye, said

MacKenzie. He charged that Physical Plant was "negligent in not contacting the faculties of music and law or Trinity College."

Lye, however, said that "nothing is firmly established yet." He stated that U of T president John Evans will make the final decision unless he wanted to refer the matter to Governing Council.

He added that he had consulted the Faculty of Music as early as April and had met with the faculty's associate dean on November 7. He didn't consult the Faculty of Law, he said, because "law didn't come into it as far as I was concerned." He didn't meet with Trinity College representatives because "that's handled by Mr. Rankin's (Alex Rankin of the Office of the Vice-President, Business Affairs) office."

He said he would send a letter to Rankin summarizing the effects of the various options "apparently open to the construction site."

Evans was out of town on Task Force affairs and Rankin too was unavailable for comment.

Stop resource sales, says Smith

By GRACE ANOBILE

Stuart Smith administered some economic medicine Wednesday in a plan to remedy Canada's declining economic situation. Speaking to U of T law students at Moot Hall the leader of the opposition said Canada must stop selling off her natural resources.

"We are becoming an underdeveloped country. We are selling a little bit of our house every day and mortgaging our future by continuing to borrow. This situation cannot be allowed to continue," the Ontario Liberal leader said.

Smith told law students that the Ontario Government must start now to pick a few areas of manufacturing and invest a lot of money in them. He maintained that Canada has assembly line industries only for products designed in the U.S.

"Whole new industries are growing up in pollution control, petro-chemicals and nuclear energy. We can compete on the world market if Canadians specialize in these areas of manufacturing," he said.

He warned, though, that capital invested in these home-grown industries would mean restraint on the part of Canadians for more money from their employers.

"It's the lack of a plan for the future which is responsible for today's students' gloomy outlook for finding employment when they graduate," Smith said.

When asked if the new technological-based Canada would mean more emphasis on math and science courses at university, he replied that there would be room for all kinds of graduates.

"We need to put Canada on her feet. When we have a firm economic basis then all sorts of jobs for all kinds of highly educated people will open up. Liberal arts students would enter the marketing and service levels of industry," he said.

The 90-cent dollar is a symptom of our bad economic situation, according to Smith, and he said Canada needs a boost from this kind of medicine.

Celtic scribes here

Canada and the Celtic consciousness is the theme of an international symposium to be held in Toronto. The symposium, held from February 5 to 12 on the U of T campus, will include a variety of musical and dramatic performances, artistic and photographic exhibitions and lectures by many outstanding scholars.

Details of the symposium were announced Wednesday at an inaugural reception at St. Michael's College. Among those participating in the event will be anthropologist Claude Lévi-Strauss, leading Celtic archaeologist Jan Philip, French new-wave philosopher Jean-Marie Benoist and famed folklorist Joseph Campbell. The Irish Times of Dublin has described the symposium as "the most ambitious gathering of Celtic scholars and personalities ever to be held in North America."

The world premiere of William Butler Yeats' Cuchulain cycle of plays, The Celtic Hero, will highlight the festivities, the festival's artistic director Professor Robert O'Driscoll announced.

Eugene Ionesco, leading exponent of the theatre of the absurd, plans to attend and will toast the performance at the final banquet, to be held at Hotel Toronto. A key speaker at the banquet will be each. The symposium, therefore, in its attempt to bridge the gap between the prehistoric, the medieval, and the modern, will look backwards and forwards at the same time."

O'Driscoll noted the appropriateness of holding the symposium in Canada, which is "essentially a Celtic country."

"Not only do we have the dominating presence of the Scottish, Irish, and Welsh in Canada, but a large number of French-Canadians are descended from Breton stock." O'Driscoll claims that February's symposium will offer "a new perspective on the Canadian nation."

The symposium chairman is Reverend John M. Kelly, president of St. Michael's College. The Board of Directors includes Sorel Etrog, York University professor Marshall McLuhan and Adrienne Clarkson.

A Wintario Project, the symposium is presented by Celtic Arts and the Canadian Association for Irish Studies as a Retrospective Celebration of the Sesquicentennial, and of the 125th Anniversary of the founding of St. Michael's College.

Staff meet

Today's Varsity meeting at 2 p.m. will discuss page allocations, readership survey, features, analysis, non-student reprints, by-line policy, CUP and ORCUP. The ORCUP conference is this weekend and the CUP conference in Halifax is looming. Let's get some discussion going on where we stand in the student press organization.

The last few words on Lang's Metropolis

Regarding the letter of Peter Harris in the Nov. 18, Varsity.

1. In the introduction to the 1975 Gregg Press edition of Metropolis it states, "The film was born in October 1924 at that moment when Fritz Lang arrived in the United States and first saw the New York skyline at night from the deck of his ship. Such a sight as this glittering, incomparable, truly 'a city of the future' — would provide the working metaphor for his newest film. He immediately discussed the idea with his wife and then constant collaborator, Thea Von Harbou, and she set to work at once on her novel Metropolis, which she and Lang would later convert into a screen play."

While no mention is made here of the three businessmen who accompanied Lang, other sources do mention them. The impression by the use of the word "immediately" is that Mrs. Lang was there. Perhaps she was not; perhaps he telephoned her immediately from New York. That is never mentioned anywhere, to my knowledge. The only date I have ever seen in print as a publishing date for the book was 1927 for the English language edition. Since the film went into production in 1925 and took 310 shooting days and 60 nights, (Roger Manvell and Heinrich Fraenkel, The German Cinema, pp. 138-39) I felt it was fairly safe to assume that something more than Fritz Lang's enthusiasm had inspired the UFA management to back the film. That considering the size of the investment in the picture, they'd want to cover that gamble by making sure that the book was out stirring up anticipation for the film.

I do not know and so cannot respond any further than that.

2. The point is not whether Hugenberg owned UFA studios before or during production of Metropolis. The point is that when it was released he was the head of the studio, he must have seen the film and it is just a coincidence or a quirk of fate that events later transpired as they did. He certainly did attempt to use Hitler as the industrialist in the film used the false Maria. I quote William L. Shirer's The Rise And Fall Of The Third Reich pg. 204, "... Papern, for all his cunning, had been left high and dry, and all his calculations that he and Hugenberg and the other defenders of the Old Order, with their 8-to-3 majority in the cabinet against the Nazis, could control Hitler and indeed use him for their own conservative ends, had exploded in his face."

Also, while the production costs on Metropolis were a factor in the bankruptcy of UFA, they were not the major nor only cause.

3. "On February 1, 1933, Hugenberg... was dismissed, and Walther Darre took his position." This is a double error and I only discovered it myself after the letter was in print. My source for the date was pg. 269 of From Caligari To Hitler where it stated, "On February 2, 1933, one day after Hitler had been appointed Chancellor of the Reich... the new Cabinet with Hitler, Dr. Hugenberg and Papen were present..." The original should have read two days, not, one day after. I, also, was thinking faster than I was writing and had meant to illustrate Hugenberg's presence in Hitler's cabinet, which was a vital part of my illustration of how Hitler allowed these men to "use" him for their own ends as the Master of Metropolis had used the robot. From there I meant to reveal how Hitler had "destroyed" the last obstacle in his path to power and by removing him from office and replacing him with one of his own. "And what of Hitler's partner in government, the German National Party, without whose support the former Austrian corporal could never have come legally to power? Despite its closeness to Hindenburg, the Army, the Junkers and big business and the debt owed to it by Hitler, it went the way of all other parties and with the same meekness. On June 21, the police and the storm troopers took over its offices throughout the country, and on June 29 Hugenberg, the bristling party leader, who had helped boost Hitler into the Chancellory but six months before, resigned from the government and his aides 'voluntarily' dissolved the party." (Rise And Fall Of The Third Reich, pg. 201) I stand informed and corrected on Hugenberg's death.

4. There are several accounts of Lang's meeting with Goebbels. Herman Weinberg had three accounts of it in Saint Cinema and each of them adds something new to the story. I believe I first heard it in one of Mr. Weinberg's Brandy And Cigars columns; he is one of the most authoritative voices on Film. I remember having read it very clearly because it was also the first time that I discovered that Fritz Lang was Jewish. Whether or not it really came up in the conversation is unimportant. Most certainly Goebbels had his spies put together a file on Lang and they were pretty damned thorough in that respect. This brings to light a deeper interest in Lang's films than I had at first glimpsed. "What Goebbels said about the necessity of an intimate relation between propaganda and people reveals how artistically he manipulated this empty world. He rejected 'power based on guns,' because power that fails to invade and conquer the soul is faced with ever-impending revolution." (From Caligari To Hitler, pg. 299) The ending of the film, Metropolis, has what Lisa Volkov referred to as a 'labour, management reconciliation' but it goes far deeper than that. The people who have been misled by a mechanical image constructed after their High Priestess (sort of an Anti-Christ) rise in rebellion and destroy the huge machines which keep the city functioning. The son of the industrialist leader falls in love with the High Priestess and comes to sympathize with the working class. At the end of the film, the false prophet destroyed, the people, unaware of the ruler's complicity in the affair, come to him in search of leadership. The film ends with a handshake which has sent most audiences viewing the film out of the theatre in disgust. But, through a manipulation of events, the Master of Metropolis has, through the Union of his son with the High Priestess, achieved dominion over not only the physical bodies of his subjects but their souls as well. While some critics reject this hypothesis, it is the theme of From Caligari To Hitler and as revealed by Goebbels, one of the core Nazi ideas.

5. Thea Von Harbou: "... she died in Germany in 1954, by that time a relatively inactive and obscure writer. It's hardly accurate to say that her reputation 'suffered' without collaboration on her husband's films, but the fact is that she was never again as famous as in the twenties." (Metropolis, pg. vii, introduction by Peter Minichiello, The Gregg Press) Nothing more of importance was heard from her.

Bad working conditions at Roberts Circulation Dept.

The following is the contents of a letter sent to Dr. R. H. Blackburn, Chief Librarian on Nov. 18, 1977:

The library technicians who are members of CUPE local 1230 in the Roberts Circulation Department are protesting the continuous deterioration of working conditions in our department. According to records kept in the charge file section, the work load has increased over the last several years — the increase from last year alone being up to 20 per cent. The staff quota, however, has remained static and at least one staff position is known to have disappeared. Student assistants have been reduced by about 20 per cent. All this has meant an increasing speed-up for the workers in the Circulation Department.

In addition to this are the problems created as a result of the university's policy of freezing job positions over the summer. Hiring of new staff for these positions was deliberately delayed until November when we were well into our busy period. Even at this present date there are positions vacant. The result has been great hardship for the other workers who had to cover for the workloads of up to eight regular staff positions. We have been unable to properly train either the new workers or the student assistants. This has created confusion in the charge file and a backlog of two to five days in filing and cancelling of charge slips.

We have always had to cope with the constant noise of the machinery and the conveyor belts, particularly in the sorting area. However, for the last year and a half the belts have deteriorated so far that the tote boxes jam or stall and the belts are often closed down for repairs. Several workers have developed back problems from lifting boxes onto the conveyor belt in the sorting area. Mr. Wright is planning to install a device to minimize the risk of back injuries, but while we are waiting for the work to begin we continue to run the danger of hurting ourselves. This situation, along with the heavy volume of books to be processed, has made the sorting area a very unpleasant and sometimes dangerous place to work. Several union members have complained individually to the administration, but they have not received any satisfactory response.

With the same number of workers trying to cope with a greatly increased workload we are unable to give the students adequate service. The malfunctioning and noise of the machinery compound our difficulties and are a source of irritation for us. The cutbacks imposed by the government are not an acceptable reason for us to endure those conditions. The members of CUPE 1230 want to see some improvement in our situation and do not intend to passively accept a poor working environment.

Member of CUPE local 1230 in the Circulation Dept. of Roberts

Reply to dissident

We are graced, it seems, with the presence of a new Russian "dissident", one Igor Glagolev, whose "expose" of the "horrors" of Soviet Russia was related in Monday's Varg.

The USSR, he tells us, "faces mass opposition to its government policies." Strange, this, since the entire nation, through the press, in union meetings, etc. has been debating and proposing amendments to a new constitution for the past 8 months. (We can't even get the premiers to discuss one, let alone the whole nation.) And there has been considerable public criticism of it and many amendments.

It simply is not true that "one-third of the population didn't vote in the last elections" less than 1 per cent did not turn out to vote, and this where voting was not compulsory. The Soviets vote Yes or No for the candidate. If a significant minority votes No, then a new election is held. Glagolev should do some homework on simple facts before he continues his "enlightening" speaking tour (for which, you can be sure, he is making a bundle).

It's true that there have been many socialist victories recently — Angola, Mozambique, Viet Nam, Laos, Cambodia, not to mention Western Europe. The list grows longer all the time. Just try telling them that they're "lackeys of Moscow" and see how far it gets you!

We are told that the CIA-sponsored Voice of America is "too shy". The Russians need the CIA to inform them???

The West, we are told, should "unite... militarily" to "weaken" the USSR (presumably about a nuclear holocaust). Where was Glagolev during the Cold War?

Glagolev's discourse was one falsehood after another — it was so full of holes that he raised the eyebrows of even our academia at the meeting.

When we are going to wake up to the reality of the "dissident" campaign?

Students "on the other side" enjoy as rights what for us are privileges — free tuition, a living stipend, inexpensive transportation and culture, full employment. It's no coincidence that people like Glagolev are shunted about here when the going gets tough.

Unfortunately, not every Soviet citizen is the ideal Socialist Man (or Woman). The likes of Glagolev makes this painfully clear.

Geneticist urges caution on DNA research

By SELWYN FIRTH

Dr. Louis Siminovich, one of the world's leading medical geneticists, urged that strict guidelines be established and adhered to regarding research on DNA, the genetic material of life.

Siminovich, chairman of U of T's Medical Genetics Department, was the first of four speakers at the last of the "Towards 2077" lecture series. Speaking to a standing room only audience at the Medical Sciences auditorium Tuesday night, Siminovich said that because of the rapid advances being made in the fields of DNA and genetics, things that were not envisioned just 30 years ago are possible now.

Citing amniocentesis — the use of amniotic fluid from a pregnant woman to predict whether or not the fetus is developing normally — and the technique of combining DNA from humans or other organisms with bacterial DNA to produce a completely new strain of bacteria, Siminovich said that in both cases the implications are enormous and should be carefully examined from moral, ethical, legal and scientific standpoints.

Concerning the use of amniocentesis to detect genetic abnormality of spinabifida, Siminovich said that even though the tests are 95 percent reliable there is still the possibility of both false positives — an indication that the fetus is abnormal when it is not, and false negatives — an indication that the fetus is normal when it is not. Siminovich also said that who pays for the testing and the necessary genetic counselling for the woman must be considered.

Siminovich was even more concerned about recombinant DNA. We don't really know where we stand in this field in relation to what we can now do with it, he said. It is now possible to produce a human hormone, somatostatin, by attaching the DNA molecules responsible for its production to bacterial DNA and allowing the bacteria to grow, he explained. As the bacteria grows it produces the somatostatin at the same time. Theoretically other hormones such as growth hormone and insulin could be produced this way also, said Dr. Siminovich. He noted the possibility of a mutant of viral DNA and bacteria being produced and escaping. "That's why we should proceed cautiously," said Siminovich.

Professor Abbayann Lynch of the Department of Philosophy emphasized the moral and ethical questions behind genetic and DNA research. A person should be seen as an end and not as a means to an end, she said. She also feels that the public must be involved in any decisions of an ethical nature regarding scientific endeavor. In order for this to happen, Lynch said, the ethicists will have to become scientifically literate.

Dr. James Reed, U of T Professor of Theology, raised some questions to try to determine whether such research is good or bad. "Does a scientist have the moral right to do anything he has the technology to do?" Reed asked. He questioned too, whether a scientist has the right to interfere in human life so long as his interference fosters beneficial qualities and removes deleterious ones.

Reed questioned the right of childbearing and the State's right to decide who should be childbearing. He also questioned who should benefit from genetic research and how the benefits should be distributed, but offered no clear-cut answer.

Justice Horst Creaver of the Supreme Court of Ontario spoke on the legal implications of genetic research. He noted that proper genetic counselling requires access to delicate information such as the identity of the real father. Creaver said in cases such as this even doctors can be made to testify. At present only lawyers cannot be legally made to testify. Creaver asked whether new laws would have to be passed to protect the counsellor-client relationship in Canada.

Creaver pointed out that presently in Canada, an abortion is illegal unless the continuance of pregnancy endangers the mother's life. No provision is made for whether or not the fetus will be normal.

These and other questions will have to be dealt with in the legal system, said Creaver. How they will be dealt with is another question, he added.

Call for basic rights for children

By ROGER SMITHIES

Children in Canada are a "third world people" whose rights are not being met, charged Barry Lowes, chairman of the Training Schools Advisory Board at a public forum Wednesday on the civil, legal and human rights of children.

Speaking with other panelists including Judge George Thompson, Associate Deputy Minister of Social and Family Services and Children's Rights advocate Jeff Wilson, Lowes stated that a "class action" is in order if the country's non-renewable resources are to be preserved for the next generation.

Children deserve an unpolluted environment and have an important stake in Canada's economic resources, said Lowes. He asserted that their "inalienable rights" include continuous loving care, a healthy birth and suitable daycare facilities.

Thompson defined children's most important right as taking a part in the process by which their rights are determined. He proposed in this context the right to a hearing, to adult representation at that hearing and access to a grievance procedure. He stressed the importance of children's full awareness of the rights protecting them. Thompson pointed out that children are exposed to sexual discrimination and girls, more frequently than boys, are charged with sexual delinquency. Constantly repeating that we must learn to "balance risks" when considering the separation of a child from his family, he asked when protection should end and punishment begin.

Wilson emphasized the importance of complete civil rights for children. This concept isn't as radical as Attorney-General Roy McMurtry seems to think it is when he says that a charter for children would destroy the family unit, Wilson stated.

Thompson argued that children's rights are basic and independent of their parents' status as taxpayers. He charged that children with learning disabilities and mental and physical handicaps are often denied public education, sometimes simply because the schools are inaccessible to those in wheelchairs. He also questioned the disproportionate number of Native children in training schools. He suggested both questions proved that a child's best interests were often eclipsed by the reality of dollars and cents. The time for lip service is over, he asserted and ensuring children access to the legal profession is the best way to preserve their rights.

Lowes, however, described Wilson's attitude as being characterized by "vehemence, urgency and dissatisfaction." He suggested that while there is never any room for complacency, the progress made in children's rights is commendable.

A member of the audience criticized the panel for obscuring the issues and delaying implementation through talking. A right is not a privilege, he stated, and one either accepts children's rights or doesn't. He also suggested that child care professionals with some legal knowledge would be more valuable than lawyers and judges in recodifying child law.

"Sell-out" explains his support of New New Program

After having been called a "sell-out" for the one-hundred fifty-second time, I have decided to defend myself in a medium in which I cannot be interrupted by either verbal or physical abuse. The epithet in question was occasioned by my support of the Erindale

"New" New Programme (NNP).

I do not wish to argue the absolute merits of a structured versus an unstructured curriculum. It is likely that no single approach will work for all subjects or all students. The cafeteria method is valid for certain disciplines but it would be courting a nervous breakdown to try it in a sequential subject.

There are valid reasons for the implementation of the NNP on the Erindale campus (please note the emphasis). Erindale College was designed for the three year general courses of the old programme of Arts and Science. The university, in its typically efficient manner, replaced the old programme with a mutilated version of the MacPherson Report at about the same time Erindale was opened. Confusion has raged non-stop ever since.

Officially Erindale students enjoy all the privileges of membership in the University of Toronto. Reality, however, differs greatly from administrative pronouncements. The number of courses available at Erindale is restricted compared to downtown. (Some Hon. Member - "But they can take courses downtown!!!") True, but every hour of class time usually requires two hours of travelling on the Sardine Express, alias the Erindale bus. Even if one's timetable has a three hour slot one must obtain approval from department heads on both campuses, the success of which depends on the department head.

Barring a sudden burst of generosity on the part of Harry Parrott and his henchmen, which should occur at about the same time as the second coming of Christ, Erindale has three choices: it can remain a second-rate copy of the St. George campus, it can strengthen certain departments at the expense of others, or it can offer core programmes in all disciplines. It is unfair to expect a small college to compete with a university many times its size. It is even more unfair to con incoming students into believing that Erindale is simply another college. Common sense would show that it is better and more honest to have a simpler curriculum adapted to the resources of Erindale College than to continue to make a mess out of one that isn't however good it may be in a proper environment.

The same reasons do not hold for the St. George campus, however. Those who think that a return to a structured curriculum for its own sake will cause the Tories to smile on us once more are suffering from a terminal case of wishful thinking. Desmond Morton's chauvinistic nonsense aside, there has to be room for those students whose interests do not fit into well-defined areas. Such students require a different education, not necessarily better, not necessarily worse, but different.

The two approaches to education are not opposites; they are

Syria against peace

I would like to express my dismay at the actions of Libya and Syria to President Sadat's visit to Jerusalem. It would not be correct to call the Syrians cry-babies in response to the fact that they declared the day of Sadat's speech to the Knesset a day of mourning. Infante whining, I suspect, is not at the root of this whining. Assad and his countrymen simply do not want peace and paradoxically seem prepared to fight fellow Arabs, the Egyptians, just so they can maintain their animosity with Israel. The Syrian position seems to be, "We are prepared to fight our friends so that we can keep fighting our enemies."

As for Libya breaking off ties with Egypt over Sadat's visit, it will not make us lose too much sleep. Nor are we surprised, for it seems that it was only yesterday that Qaddafi made his unsuccessful attempt to assassinate Sadat. The Libyans are the real cry-babies here. After failing in their attempt to kill Sadat they have decided to get "serious". Now like little children they are telling Sadat, "We're not talking to you."

complements. There is no reason for the conservative members of the Faculty of Arts and Science to bleat "four legs good, two legs bad" every time the government and the Globe and Mail say so. Similarly it is equally unreasonable for the liberals to start a counter-bleat when their pet philosophies are threatened. Both can exist as parts of a unified whole.

Within the regulations of the Faculty there is a great deal of leeway. I suggest that other colleges consider their own modifications of the present programme, and I do not mean simply adopting Erindale's proposals. With careful planning greater autonomy for the constituent colleges could relieve much of the inhospitable character of this university without costing a great deal of money.

Watkins misquoted

I hesitate to write letters to editors, for fear of being thought ready for appointment to the Senate, but the two sentences you devote to the paper I presented at the Conference "The American Empire and Dependent States" manage to reduce my views to such a mixture of gibberish and dogma that I would appear indeed to be worthy of appointment thereto. I spoke from a prepared text; should any of your readers wish to know what I really said, I would endeavour to provide a copy.

U of T daycare continues fight for survival

Most of today's students at U of T never witnessed the longest sit-in in Canada's history. In 1972 the Campus Co-operative Community Daycare Centre was the object of a year-long sit-in held by parents and students on this campus. The university now officially recognizes the need for daycare centres, and organizers say they enjoy improved relations with the administration. In a two-part series, Varsity reporter Chris Staddon examines U of T daycare centres today:

By CHRIS STADDON

The haunting spectre of budgetary cutbacks on daycare has engendered a kind of fortress mentality on the part of daycare supporters, according to Michael Burns, a coordinator at the Campus Co-operative Community Daycare Centre. "All of our energy goes into defending what we've got."

This insecurity has been a constant factor in the history of the centre. Organized in 1969 by a subgroup of the Women's Liberation Movement, the centre espoused free, universal daycare.

With the conviction that U of T should have a greater sense of social responsibility towards the surrounding community, the group took over university-owned property at 12 Sussex Street to serve as an infant daycare centre for staff and students at U of T and other parents in the area.

Demands for fire-safety renovations were finally met by the university after student support had been mobilized for a sit-in at Simcoe Hall in 1970.

Campus daycare organizers waged another political battle with the Provincial Day Nurseries Branch over its refusal to grant the Centre a license because it did not employ professionally-trained day nursery workers.

After unsuccessfully appealing the decision, the centre hired a person deemed qualified by the Day Nurseries Branch and received its license in 1973, qualifying the daycare for municipal grants.

In the meantime, the struggle with the university was renewed. U of T's refusal to lease the old meteorological clubhouse on Devonshire as a centre for the "graduates" of the infant daycare, resulted in further confrontation tactics. Parents occupied the building and refused an administration compromise of a university-run daycare centre in the occupied building for the children of staff and students only.

The University Committee on Day Care, recognizing "an urgent and pressing need for daycare facilities on campus," proceeded to renovate an old coach house, beside the occupied building on Devonshire, for the Margaret Fletcher Daycare Centre. The Campus Co-operative Community Daycare Centre remained in its second location, secured a lease, making it eligible for provincial government funds for renovations and became licensed to care for children over the age of 2.

Today the two cooperative centres have little contact with U of T, according to coordinator Michael Burns. U of T leases the buildings to them but has no governing function in the daycare, he said. The infant centre at 12 Sussex is part of Innis College and has been leased for 25 years. The over-two centre at the rear of 315 Bloor St. West rents the building from the university on a five-year renewable lease for $150 a month.

The two centres now provide care for a total of 46 children — 16 infants at 12 Sussex and 30, between the ages of 2 and 5, at the Devonshire centre. Almost all of them are the children of working parents — many of them single parents.

The centres would now like to move back into a closer relationship with the university. "We're certainly open to university students," says Burns, who is puzzled that so few in the university community make use of their services. He speculates that, in the centres' fight for autonomy, some at the university may have become alienated.

The "tremendous personal commitment and involvement" which the cooperative daycare centres demand from their parent-workers has "turned off" the less zealous, Burns says. He added that some parents just want a baby-sitting service.

Parents are expected to work at least one four-hour shift in the daycare as well as attend regular meetings or "educational", Burns explained. The number of paid full-time parent-workers has increased to five at the Devonshire centre and five at Sussex Street. Some coordinators have professional daycare training but the emphasis is still on philosophical commitment and experience with children, he said. With the help of student volunteers a "good working adult-child ratio" is maintained of three to one at the infant centre and five to one at the Devonshire centre.

Over the years parent workers have adopted a more structured mode of operation with the increased hiring of paid staff, the recent institution of a board of directors (all decisions, however, must still be approved by the parents) and more planned programs within which the children still enjoy "a lot of freedom" according to Burns.

"We have put out a tremendous amount of energy into keeping the daycare going," said Burns. "The legacy of our struggle has been a strong sense of community." The constant discussions among parents have led to higher quality of child care at the centres, he feels. The children start their schooling with better developed social and other skills than those who have been exposed only to the nuclear family, Burns stated.

The cooperative has maintained its philosophical integrity but Burns fears that the centres, and other daycare centres which rely heavily on government subsidies, are losing ground financially. Operating costs have spiralled and increases in funding lag behind the rate of inflation. At present municipal subsidies average $13.33 a child per day for both centres with a minimum fee of 50 cents per day paid by the parent(s). Budgeted operating costs for the two centres next year represent an increase of $12,000 over this year.

The Campus Co-operative Community Daycare Centres are now making more formal contacts with other daycare centres in the city. They also belong to the Daycare Action Alliance, a loose organization of daycare centres across the country, which can be quickly mobilized in a crisis situation. Unfortunately, said Burns, in the struggle to defend what they already have "there is little energy left to argue for better quality daycare."

Second-Language Monitor Program September 1978-May 1979

This program allows university-level students in Canada to work part-time as second-language monitors while studying full-time, usually in a province other than their own. At least 800 students will receive a minimum of $3,000 each for nine months of participation. In addition, travel expenses for one return trip between the student's province of residence and the host province will be reimbursed.

This program is financed by the Department of the Secretary of State.

The number of French-language and/or English-language monitors accepted by a host province will be determined according to the particular needs of that province.

To obtain a brochure and an application form, contact the coordinator in your province:

innards

For the latest in padded cod-pieces and body stockings, turn to page 13. Here we see Peter Schaufuss, a recent acquisition by the National Ballet of Canada and a late cut from the Green Bay Packers.

Try walking into a crowd of reasonably open-minded music fans and quietly suggest that you like Kiss. The reaction you get will be similar to suggesting to a conservationist that baby seals might be more effectively killed by dynamiting their ice flows. They will look at you in horror, disgust, and disbelief. They will think you are kidding.

I like Kiss. And no, I'm not kidding. I acquired this unfashionable taste by attending a Kiss Gardens concert. Before that time I had dutifully scoffed at my little brother's enthusiasm for the four paint-splattered no-talent goons. But when I saw those eight foot tall monsters blow up their guitars, spit blood, breathe fire, rise forty feet into the air and get everyone in the sold-out hall, including myself, on their chairs, I was hooked.

The truth of the matter is that Kiss is a carefully conceived image. They have taken every rock-dream imagined and packaged them in a totally surface, but totally entertaining package. They are the Harvey's of rock. They have no pretensions. They just satisfy basic animal needs.

The basic Kiss concert runs something like this: a wimpy little announcer comes out to the microphone and tries to make himself heard over the combined screams of what has to be the most enthusiastic audience in rock. "You asked for the best and you got it. The hottest band in the land, Kiss!" The wimp then scurries off-stage as the four behemoths run on stage playing "Detroit Rock City". They tear through about five tunes, while doing calisthenics that would put Mick Jagger to shame, before Paul Stanley, the major voice of the band begins to exhort the crowd to stand on their heads and stamp their feet. Bassist Gene Simmons, the band's Godzilla, spits blood and breathes fire. Ace Frehly's guitar smokes as he's playing it, and finally explodes. Drummer Peter Cris rises in the air to an unprecedented height while confetti flash pots and strobe lights go off. Finally all favour members of the band are raised off the ground and over the heads of the audience on rising platforms.

Now that's entertainment.

They combine a safe sicko sexuality with the best in Japanese sci-fi flicks. The kids, who are sick of their 60's bred parents raving about the Yardbirds, have grabbed on to them as cultural idols. They are the ultimate product of the seventies. So slick they squeak and so superficial you can enjoy them without thinking. They're like television. Only much louder. They have no pretensions. They just satisfy basic animal needs like a toilet does.

That is not to say that they're perfect. They won't be until they blow themselves up on stage. But they are the closest thing in rock to a concert worth $7.50. They totally reject the idea that a serious musician playing his latest album onstage, while sitting on a stool, is a concert. Jeff Beck doesn't perform live, he performs dead. A Kiss concert, no matter how bad the audience or how bored the performers, is always good.

As for their music, it's simple. It straddles punk, pop and pap without making a firm commitment to either. It's loud, rhythmic and fraught with oxymorons for sexual intercourse. It is no worse, and often much better, than the stuff churned out by a hundred other hard rock bands. And it's definitely more fun.

That brings us to the latest Kiss disc, Kiss Alive II. Kiss should always be recorded live. It's their natural element. It keeps them safely out of the hands of moronic producers (i.e. Bob Ezrin) and captures a glimmer of that stomping-sixteen-year-old fanaticism that follows this band. Unfortunately one side of this double album set is a studio recording of new songs. They're alright songs, but they don't compare with the live sides.

The advantage this album has over the first Kiss live album is two-fold. First, the material is better. The first live album was covered with plodding turkeys like "Parasite". This disc culls the best songs, with the exception of "Beth", from their best albums. Second, the boys have learnt to play their instruments. The big drawback on the first live album was Ace Frehly's comical lead guitar. On this disc he has caught up to the standards of the other fellas.

Okay. By now you're probably convinced that I'm a dangerous teen lobot and that I'm going to say that Kiss Alive II is the greatest rock album of this or any other decade. I'm not that warped. Yet Kiss is a personal perversion of mine. You probably like black olives, yoga, sleeping with your clothes on, the Mary Tyler Moore Show or (shudder) disco. Kiss is no worse than any of these and is probably better for your complexion than most of them.

So, if you don't have a Kiss album, and you don't want to miss one of the documents of the seventies (that's right, this is the seventies. The Beatles are gone, remember?) buy this album. It comes with a full colour booklet and Kiss water transfer tattoos. You can't lose. In any event, stop criticizing until you have seen their stage show. You won't believe.

Writers whip out huge 12 inchers

Penal servitude

Back in '73, the keyboard player for Yes, a certain Mr. Rick Wakeman, brought out a solo work entitled The Six Wives of Henry the Eighth. Rightly acclaimed as one of the best progressive rock albums of the year, the album's success prompted Rick to start a solo career. The result was five silly, boring and pretentious concept albums.

Now Rick is back with Yes and, with the help of Alan White and Chris Squire, has brought out yet another solo work. This one, entitled "Criminal Record" (cute) is a collection of six keyboard works revolving around the theme of crime and criminals. Some people never learn.

Side one opens with "Statue of Liberty". It is a rambling keyboard clap-trap fraught with the customary Wakeman soaring synthesizers and syncopated rhythms. It's texturally interesting but leads to nothing except an arbitrary fade-out. "Crime of Passion" starts off with a wimpy mellotron theme, jerks into an electronic disco-duck tune and then returns to the original theme. I just don't understand. "Chamber of Horrors" is an attempt at a theme song for "Dracula Meets the Texas Chain-Saw Massacre", but comes across sounding like a bastardised "Star Wars".

Side two contains Rick's first solo piano piece, "The Birdman of Alcatraz". Only the piano is double tracked and bird sounds are dubbed in. It sounds like someone locked Henry Mancini in the toucan cage at the new Metro Zoo. "The Breathalyzer" is an attempt at musical humour that almost works. If you like burps. The last piece, "Judas Iscariot", is the best on the album. With the help of a huge church organ and choir Wakeman conjures up both the phantom of the opera and the best in epic movie themes. It rambles, but at least it sustains a mood.

Wakeman is not devoid of technique, he's simply devoid of ideas. He has a sickeningly cutesy sense of humour and an unnatural affinity to concept albums. It leaves him hovering between the esoteric and the idiotic.

Night after Night, Lofgren comes on stage, but disc is limp.

Solo member grins

Nils Lofgren is an original rock'n'roll romantic who ran away from home at the age of fifteen, clutching his guitar. For some time he was a member of Crazy Horse, the band behind Neil Young, and then he formed the now-defunct group Grin. Lately though he's just been plain Nils Lofgren with three solo albums to his credit; all of which have received some critical acclaim, but have not sold well.

Meanwhile back at the record company, the bright little business boys in their Pierre Cardin suits and Gucci shoes have decided that what's needed is a double live album to turn the kid into a star (just look at Frampton and Kiss). So Nils' fourth solo effort Night After Night is released. Well they're all wrong: the world needs another double live album like I need syphilis.

But let's not be too critical, this album does have some good points: I mean there are three good tunes, the production is real nifty, and Nils is kinda cute. Unfortunately there's just not enough good material to warrant one record, let alone two. Why do record companies do this to us?

Lofgren's supporting cast have talent and occasionally they show it, producing a bluesy, Gospel sound. But it's Lofgren's sly guitar work and plaintive vocals that steal the show. Whenever he takes a break, it's game over — the band dies a horrible death. Hedges better: like he's supporting his brother the guitar player and his brother the roadie. Even his parents get a mention in the liner notes and God knows how many other relatives were involved in this project.

Lofgren is at his best when he's singing about girls and rock'n'roll. The premier cut is about the latter; titled "Keith Don't Go", it's a plea for his idol Keith Richard not to return to Toronto to face cocaine possession charges, (dumb Mounties). The song is poignant. "It's Not A Crime" and "I Came To Dance" are performed nicely, but then again they were great on the studio albums. Apart from those three tunes, the rest of the disc is dull, dull, dull.

So all you ginchy Gucci guys back at the office, you have set the poor man back years by releasing this turkey. Nils Lofgren is not devoid of talent, but he just doesn't have the right material or band to work with yet. Night After Night is an insult; don't even touch it if you're in a record store.

Bruce Cockburn

This is the album Cockburn fans have been waiting for, because it is the recording of the tour they have been waiting for since Nightvisions. Last spring Bruce Cockburn finally toured with some of the musicians he has been recording with since 1974. Circles In The Stream, recorded at the end of that tour in Maddy Hall presents the old familiar format of his concerts filled out with the extra instrumentation. Of particular merit is percussionist Bill Usher, adding atmosphere instead of noise. Cockburn does out guitar parts to Pat Godfrey on piano and Robert Boucher on bass to re-inforce and update his arrangements with the result that he is less busy on band numbers yet the songs remain essentially the same.

New Cockburn fans will be pleased with the greatest hits style of the album plus the permanent memory of a wonderful concert, but I fear that veteran fans will be disappointed in the lack of excitement it conveys. Although Bruce's guitar sounds as perfect as ever in guitar pieces like "Deer dancing round a broke mirror", "Cader Idris" and even "Barrelhouse" there is a predictability in that perfection that lacks adventure. This may be the one Cockburn album I'll get tired of.

However, I'm reluctant to criticize him because he is far and away the most sophisticated and beautiful popular artist Canada has yet produced. If for no other reason, buy the album for the electric-guitar solo on "Dialogue With the Devil" to see just what the state-of-the-art in soloing is at.

French ticklers

If it's partially or completely true of most modern music that the lyrics and the sounds of words are unimportant, the same cannot be said of CANO. Those who say "Whoever listens to the words anyway" have heard Jethro Tull but not la Cooperative des artistes de Nouvel-Ontario, a new Sudbury band who have hit paydirt in Quebec and are actively striving for recognition and listening time in the rest of Canada.

Although members of CANO often insist that "Music is the common language", the language they have set to music and the way they have done it treats us to a simple but clear, full vocal effect. The rich voice of Rachel Paiement, who sings with all the force of her talent, is the reason this can be said.

Je me souviens: mon moulin, mon village,

Mes trois amis, mes deux langages
Quand mon pays était un paysage
Bien en vie et sans age

The lyrics of CANO's second album, Au Nord de notre view, revolve around northern nature scenes and individual Canadian experiences. You will perk up your ears at the beauty of the very sound of the words, never mind their meaning. They are sung and combined with instruments in a style which cannot be filed with justice under a non-hyphenated rubric, and if you've heard CANO you will have to admit "C'est un genre."

This is an inconvenient result of their being so innovative. CANO members prefer to call themselves folk musicians, but some material is more rock than anything else. A heavy jazz influence infiltrates much of their rhythms whereas certain portions border on classical. Some passages, particularly those sung by Rachel Paiement, smack of Joni Mitchell, as more than one critic has noticed. Indeed, many numbers, because of their dreamy, flowing nature, are suited to the slow moving pace of a quiet cafe rap. Anyhow, this diversity has so far prevented the press from settling collectively on a single, all-encompassing appellation.

A good thing is that the songs do not end abruptly; usually one just melts into the next. The album's title song, Au nord de notre view, a composition of three distinct tunes, is an example of superbly orchestration. Usually a piece that blends as many instruments as this one (there are twelve musicians) sounds blurred, but this baby is fresh as the smell of eucalyptus oil. "Mon Pays" is like that in that way.

Other sections are less successful. Parts of songs are less rich, although not exactly tinny. "En mouvement" sounds slightly too commercial for my liking but if you like jingles everything is peachy.

Andre Paiement's vocals do not approach the distinctness, the clarity and the beauty of his sister's.

Except for one number entitled "Frere Jacques" (It's been jazzed up a bit) their repertoire is unborrowed.

Those who are not upset by the castration of poetry through translation, as well as non-francophones, may appreciate the fact that an English version of the lyrics is also presented on the inside album cover.

Jim Edwards

Queen members drag

This sounds like a high school band doing tunes rejected from Queen's previous five lps, and doing a bad job of it.

New of the World seems hastily put together, Queen forsaking their usual process of overdubbing countless vocals and guitars in favour of a spare sound that highlights the half-baked nature of the lp's compositions and the bad shape of Mercury's voice. So why go back on the production style that made them one of the top five acts of the Seventies?

One possibility is that they are simply sick of the long and expensive (five months and $100,000) method they employed on "A Night at the Races", "Opera" and "A Day at the Races". Lead vocalist Freddie Mercury gave some hint of this in a 1975 interview granted as he sat drained and despairing from the "Opera" sessions. "I really feel that on our next album we'll orchestrate it with an orchestra — we've done all we can do with guitars." On "News of the World" they simply leave out all orchestration, guitar or otherwise.

Listening to the monotonous drone of drummer Roger Taylor's "Sheer Heart Attack" (from "News"), one could get the idea that Queen is interested in Punk. Guitarist Brian May's remarks supporting various punk outfits would lend credence to this theory. However the idea of prancing pouf Mercury imitating rotten Johnny Rotten seems laughable when listening to the range of styles on this lp.

To me, the most satisfying theory is the one where Queen felt compelled to put out a new lp in time for both their North American tour and huge pre-Christmas sales. They therefore tossed together, in a very short time, a poor package of rapidly written, hastily recorded tunes. The sad state of this lp is compounded by the bad shape of Mercury's vocal chords. He's shredded his once fine voice into a harsh, grating ghost of the instrument that did vocal somersaults all over "Queen II", their second lp. He can't hit those high notes anymore, and nodules have been creeping onto his vocal chords over the last three years. Concert dates on the past four tours have been regularly cancelled to let his voice rest. And almost every article written about Queen over their career mentions at least in passing Mercury's constant complaints over his voice. Samples: "After that Rainbow gig, the next morning I felt like I'd swallowed a football" and "I have to sing an octave lower now on stage: if I don't and I reach for a high note, nothing comes out."

Nowhere is this, and all the other problems that afflict this lp, more apparent than on the opening track, "We Will Rock You." It starts with distressingly distorted drums (the volume meters must have been buried) and Mercury's grating vocals, as he promises the audience a good time. The chorus is an overdubbed affair, without harmonies, in the style of the unison singing a soccer stadium full of football fanatics can pull off. If done well, it's a genuinely stirring sound. Queen however didn't take the time to add enough voices. The climax comes in the form of a wobbly Brian May guitar solo.

It's because of tracks like that one that "News of the World" won't join the other five Queen lps in my collection.

Theatre

It doesn't say anything, it's just sick

Factory Theatre Lab has done it again. Everytime they produce plays like The Boy Bishop or The Revolutionary Project, all hearts that long for new experiences in theatre beat a little faster. Then, with uncanny self-destructiveness, they produce overwhelming clunkers like Peaches and Poisoned Cream and now Winter Offensive. No theatre in Toronto, with the exception perhaps of Theatre Second Floor, is so open to varied forms of expression in theatre as Factory Lab. But with Winter Offensive, Factory Lab has again presented garbage disguised as experiment.

I won't try to describe the plot. Writer and director Ken Gass might like to believe that this production, through showing Nazi leaders debasing themselves at a Christmas party just before the fall of the Third Reich, reveals some of the intricate and very frightening relationships between violence, sex, politics and power. Somewhere under the heap of theatrically dated, stomach-wrenching episodes there may even be a good political comment on the filth of Nazism. But any sense of an honest dramatic goal, a lesson, a message, or an attempt to hit a "sensitive nerve" is completely subordinated by the tremendous disrespect with which the audience is treated by this play.

Of course, Canadians should understand fascism's butchery. The violence in punk rock shows that at least some people are dangerously naive politically and need to be reminded that a cultural joke can become a destructive political movement. Rather than demonstrating this, however, he asks his audience to revel in it, laugh at it and enjoy it like pigs in shit. We are expected to want to see this bestiality, but to do so we have to suspend our self-respect and respect for art and life — precisely the personal qualities that can prevent another holocaust.

All I saw on Factory Lab's stage opening night was ugliness, ugliness that overwhelmed and demeaned any justifiable dramatic purpose. It's not that human dirt, dripping guts, bestial sexual relations between people, or grossly sadistic images aren't sometimes useful to theatre. When theatre was trapped in the deadly cycle of re-interpreting classics, shocking audiences out of their semi-catatonic passivity at "commercial" theatres was a significant leap in theatre technique. Or when a writer wishes to say something about degenerating human values, then by all means shock. But when all the garbage is on the stage, make sure we are shown that there is a mind at work beneath it.

Part of what is so disgusting, besides the actual shit (probably chocolate) that is rubbed into the characters' faces (oh what a trite metaphor) or the blood dripping from the servant's mouth, is that there is nothing really experimental here. The staging, with its campy, gross party setting and silly confusion between true shock and mindless animalistic titillation, is old stuff. The influence of the Ridiculous Theatre Company's Camille that Gass brought to Toronto at the beginning of the season is painfully obvious. That show was already dated when Laugh-In died. And Dr. Strangelove has done the sex-blood-guts thing much better.

Already I can hear the defensive cries coming from the miscreants who latch on to every new trend in "art", however dull and insignificant, that no one understands the point of the play — "Don't you see that this play backs an audience against the wall with the supreme degeneracy of political power struggles?" Isn't it marvelous that we can make so many people angry: at least we're forcing them to respond? 'Why this might be part of the New Wave?' etc. etc. Come on. That's the stuff that people fall back on when they can't figure out a way to influence an art that is outstripping them or a society that won't let them pout. Challenge! Threaten! Excite! Enchant! Shock! But, Factory Lab, stop running the immense talents of your writers, directors and actors through the mud in the interest of this meaningless, self-indulgent anal fantasy.

un soir au café théâtre

Une étoile est née: U.C. Café Théâtre Vendredi 18 novembre, 5 heures: une agitation fébrile règne au 79a St. George Street, investi par l'équipe du Café-Théâtre. Elle a trois heures pour métamorphoser U.C. Play-House en un Bastinque digne de la butte Montmartre à Paris ou du vieux Québec. Affiches "rétro", petites tables, nappes à carreaux et bougies: le tour est joué. Derrière le bar, les bouteilles de vin et autres nourritures terrestres s'accumulent sous la garde de Marylou; sur la scène, Larissa, conseillère artistique, court d'une ultime répétition à l'autre, les répliques de Molière, Ionesco, Feydeau, Fernand Reynaud, se croisent, entrecoupées de bribes de chansons, avec, en fond sonore, les gammes de John le pianiste. Seule Karin, le mime, promène inlassablement son "P'tit chien" en silence. Par moments les essais d'éclairage de Christine plongent dans le noir le film accéléré du (très) prochain spectacle. Dans les loges, Philippe, maître de philosophie d'un soir aide Daryl à ajuster sa perruque de "Bourgeois gentilhomme"; Jean-Marc refuse de donner sa "Leçon" à Karin avant d'avoir retrouvé sa barbe de professeur. Lesley s'est réfugié dans le foyer des artistes pour accorder au calme sa guitare d'où s'élèveront tout à l'heure les notes de "Jeux interdits"; mais Elie, Candy et Nathalie ont eu la même idée Danièle, le souffleur, se poste derrière le piano, à l'affût des trous de mémoire, Rachid ranime les énergies qui vacillent sous la pression du trac...

8 heures: un cri s'élève: "Les voilà!" La scène se vide précipitamment, les portes s'ouvrent, et, accueillis par Nicole et Nancy, les serveuses, "ils" entrent. "Ils", un public à l'image de la troupe qui va jouer pour lui: enseignants, étudiants de tous niveaux, de toutes disciplines, spécialistes ou non en français, plus ou moins francophones, réunis ce soir-là par un intérêt commun: faire sortir le français des salles de cours, le chanter, en rire, le faire vivre... Le faire vivre, pour commencer le spectacle, au rythme d'un French Can-can exécuté "haute-la-jambe" par la quasi-professionnelle troupe du Melon Rouge de Victoria College. Puis, Prévert, s'il avait été dans la salle, aurait pu ajouter à son "Inventaire": un lit pour "Amélie", l'accent texan (!) de M. Martin dans "La Cantatrice Chauve", Ionesco encore avec la "Leçon", ess propres poèmes, Brel et sa "Chanson des Vieux Amants", des guitares et leurs chansons, de Moustaki et Le Forestier au folklore français, de Beau-Dommage à Harmonium, un invisible mais très présent p'tit chien et son mine, un ballet espagnol qui ne fit que passer, un plombier-poète et... un perroquet-raseur!

11 heures: Muriel, la présentatrice, salue le public au nom de toute la troupe par ces mots:

"Nous qui sommes plein de bonne volonté
Guidés par des inconscients
Nous faisons l'impossible pour des ingrats.
Et nous avons fait tellement
Depuis si longtemps avec si peu
Que nous sommes maintenant en mesure
De faire n'importe quoi
A partir de rien".

Un salut qui est aussi une invitation à joindre vos talents et vos idées à leurs efforts pour le prochain spectacle.

Becalmed Maugham bombs

It is unfortunate that Somerset Maugham's ability to weave masterful tales was wasted on such useless subject matter. The Circle, currently playing at the Royal Alex, is a perfect example.

The plot is quite simple and commonplace. The wife of a man who has aspirations to be prime minister invites to their country estate his mother, who left home when he was five years old thirty years ago, causing a great scandal at the time, but the plan goes awry when the young woman's father-in-law, who was supposed to be in Paris for a month, shows up on the day that his ex-wife, who deserted him and ruined his own parliamentary career, is scheduled to arrive. You can see clearly how the plot thickens from this point.

The play has an increasing number of witty barbs as it progresses, but these are interspersed among the monotonous stretches of early twentieth-century British parlour conversation.

The stars of the show give their expected fine performances. The husband and wife team of Coogie Withers and John McCallum give real life to their characters; he as the wily, contented, old man, she as a woman who hides her age with over-bearing enthusiasm and hair colouring. Bill Fraser, as the pompous Lord Porteous, actually brings the most joy to the scene.

But the characters are as crusty as the rare antique furniture, the silver tea sets brought by uniformed servants, and the portraits of noble ancestors which surround them. Their breed is but a handful of society. They are those whose reminiscences concern whether he, upon becoming prime minister, would've made her governess of India, or merely Barbados. Of course, these pointless conversations are held during the evening's polite game of bridge, where long, flowing gowns and exquisite smoking jackets are compulsory dress.

The plot, although an enchanting story, is only a bundle of tired Christian morals. The subservience of a woman to her husband is strongly promoted. At one particularly touching part of the play, the long-lost mother-in-law tells her daughter-in-law how a youthful caprice in her own life degenerated into separate affairs for her and her husband. She warns her daughter-in-law about such dangerous things as true love and women's suffrage. Better she should stay home in the protective care of her husband.

But this warning is reversed at the end of the play. We all cheer as the sweet, young thing elopes with her poor but dedicated heartthrob for a "ripping" life in the Federated Malay States.

Thus, the lesson for a young woman is unclear. Should she remain with her husband, to whom she has pledged everlasting allegiance, though she may find him physically repulsive, or should she succumb to a passionate whim and fly off to the Federated Malay States? These choices are irrelevant to the average Varsity reader not only because the Federated Malay States no longer exist, but because the problem stems from the character's social status. How many students have to decide whether to give up fame, fortune, and majestic luxury?

That is not to say that Maugham's description of the people of that social stratum is inaccurate. They live that same existence today as they did in 1921 when this play was originally performed. It's just that there is no redeeming social importance in the petty trials and tribulations of this small, moribund class of rich and super-arrogant parasites.

Irma la Douce

Irma La Douce chez St. Paul! Une rencontre séduisante. Depuis le 8 novembre, avec le Théâtre du P'tit Bonheur, le public torontois rencontre chaque soir la douce Irma, déambulant avec nonchalance sous les voûtes vénérables du St. Paul's centre. Que fait-elle là son métier. Dison plus élégamment qu'elle est une belle de nuit, une fleur qui a poussé sur le pavé de Pigalle. Autour d'elle, s'étend Paris mais l'univers d'Irma se limite au point de Caulaincourt où elle attend ses clients. Une chambre sous les toits, un banc, un café et ses mauvais garçons: le décor est planté. Soudain, il s'anime: Bob-le-Hotu (Jean-Marc Amyot), le garçon du café, nous introduit dans ce "microcosme" en nous présentant Irma "sagement" assise sur son banc, Polye-le-Mou (Marc Royer), Jojo-les-Yeux-Sales (Pierre Begue), Roberto-les-Diams (Raymond Accolas), la laborieuse équipe du café, dont la seule activité avouable est une interminable partie de cartes, interrompue de temps en temps par quelques injures bien senties et des simulacres de bagarres.

Cette existence quasi-bourgeoise aurait pu continuer ainsi si l'amour, ses tourments et ses joies n'avaient surgi sous les traits harmonieux de Nestor-le-Fripe (Serge Marquis), fils de bonne famille, d'envoyé mais au grand coeur. Il est séduit par la douceur d'Irma, elle ne peut résister à l'élégance et aux bonnes manières de Nestor. Ils tombent dans les bras l'un de l'autre, sans se douter que la passion, l'argent et la jalousie les entraîneront dans des aventures tragiques.

Née en 1956 de l'imagination d'Alexandre Breffort, ex-chauffeur de taxi devenu romancier, les aventures d'Irma sont aujourd'hui mises en scène par Eugène Gallant, directeur artistique du Théâtre du P'tit Bonheur. Gallant a été enseignant au Département de théâtre de l'Université de Moncton, metteur en scène à Montréal, à Ottawa pour le Centre national des Arts et pour le Département de français de l'Université Carleton. Ionesco, Molière, des traductions françaises de Shakespeare, les oeuvres de canadiens français sont autant de mises en scène signées par Eugène Gallant, soucieux de toucher le plus large public. Pourquoi aujourd'hui avoir choisi Irma La Douce "L'année dernière, répond Eugène Gallant, quand j'ai choisi les pièces de la saison, c'était un peu "à la pige", connaissant encore peu Toronto. Cette année j'ai essayé de trouver son poulx. J'ai l'impression que le spectacle de comédie musicale, de cabaret, le public ici le découvre. Il y a une réelle demande."

Irma La Douce représente en effet ce spectacle complet, ponctué par les mélodies composées par Marguerite Monnot et devenues des classiques de la chanson populaire. L'accompagnement musical est joué au piano par Lucien Robichaud, dans le plus pur style du café-concert. A spectacle complet, comédiens complets: "J'avais, poursuit Eugène Gallant, en la personne d'Anne-Marie de Varennes Sparkes une excellente comédienne qui joue un rôle fait pour elle." Anne-Marie est en effet une Irma à la gouaille plus parisienne que nature. Interprète fidèle du TPB, elle a par ailleurs fondé l'an dernier sa propre troupe de théâtre "Perds Pas l'Nord Inc." La voix de Serge Marquis, déjà remarquable dans "Piaf et compagnie" au Schubert's cabaret, fait passer toute l'émotion d'un personnage déchiré par la passion et la jalousie. Mais au milieu du "drame" le plus noir, l'ironie complice de Jean-Marc Amyot, les gags chorégraphiques des trois mauvais garçons viennent à point pour détendre l'atmosphère et rappeler à chacun qu'au pays de la comédie musicale the happy end est reine et que tout finit toujours par des chansons.

Elle est aussi le domaine de la fantaisie débridée. L'oeuvre d'Alexandre Breffort commence sur le cliché de la fille-légère-amoureuse-d'un-garçon-charmant-mais-sans-le-sou-qu'elle-entretient-en-travaillant. Mais il fait voler en éclats cette convention larmoyante pour y introduire une dimension absurde et diabolique. Jaloux des "clients" de sa Douce, Nestor décide Irma de ne se consacrer qu'à un seul protecteur Monsieur Oscar qui ne sera autre que lui-même, maiconnaissable sous une grande barbe et un large chapeau. Tout semble parfait jusqu'au moment où Nestor épuisé par sa double vie d'amoureux et de client abandonne sa barbe, provoquant ainsi la disparition de Monsieur Oscar. Il est alors accusé du meurtre de celui que tout le monde considèrerait comme son rival. Le voilà donc au bague de Cayenne, loin d'Irma qui, comblé de désespoir, attend un enfant. Bonnes âmes, ne vous lamentez pas, par une de ces piroquettes propres à la comédie musicale, Nestor s'évadera à temps pour assister à la naissance de jumeaux qu'Irma appellera, suprême ironie, Oscar et Nestor. Des aventures aussi rocambolesques que celles du dédoublement de personnalité d'Oscar exigent des astuces de mise en scène et de décor! Ainsi, Serge Marquis navigue du côté cour au côté jardin. Ces deux côtés où s'ouvrent symétriquement les fenêtres des deux "nids d'amour" d'Irma sont la représentation matérielle de la double vie d'Oscar. Le TPB arrive ainsi à donner une forme structurée à un spectacle de cabaret dont la fantaisie et la spontanéité restent intactes. On peut seulement regretter que le St. Paul's centre n'offre pas un cadre plus intimiste, plus chaleureux, plus adapté à ce spectacle.

Conscient de la nécessité de donner au TPB un cadre conçu selon les exigences particulières de leurs spectacles, Eugène Gallant et son équipe, en s'associant avec le Open Circle Theatre et le New Theatre, emmèneront à la fin de cette saison dans une ancienne cour de justice victorienne: la Cour Adélaïde, actuellement rénovée avec l'aide des gouvernements d'Ottawa et de Queen's Park. Cette rénovation est la première étape d'un ambitieux projet: créer un centre d'animation culturelle (en français et en anglais) avec deux restaurants, deux théâtres, un bar-salon et des ateliers accessibles aux étudiants intéressés par l'improvisation théâtrale.

La réalisation de ce projet permettra d'amplifier une politique appliquée depuis 1967 sa situation de théâtre permanent en langue française dans une ville anglophone donne au TPB un objectif bien particulier: encourager et refléter la culture d'expression française en Ontario.

Mais quel public cet objectif concerne-t-il, pour Eugène Gallant? "J'ai appris que le public qui vient chez nous est un public francophone mais aussi anglophone comprenant le français (il y a aussi des synopsis en anglais) et qui aime entendre des comédiens professionnels dans une production professionnelle et qui jouent en français!"

Sur les pas d'Irma-la-Douce, man nent déjà la diva de Les Hauts et les Bas d'une Diva, les marionnettes de L'Eclipse, quatre jeunes femmes dans Quatre à Quatre et la Cocotte de Feydeau.

D'autres rencontres en perspective avec le Théâtre du P'tit Bonheur...

Nabob snob gobs on bob

As reviewers have said many times over the last hundred years, the Vic Bob Revue is the best entertainment bargain on campus. It was worth every one of the 50 cents it cost to see it.

As a reviewer with a conflict of interest — I think I may have been the victim of one of the Bob's many parodies — I must admit that Vic's crew of zanies kept me laughing.

The Bob always claims that any resemblance of characters in the revue to "known persons living or dead is statistically improbable." I say that I may have been the butt of one of their "barbs," because in Vic parlance, once one goes to write for the Varsity one is classified as being beyond life or death, and no one at Vic knows you anymore — that they will admit. If, in fact, I was not barbed then forgive my outrageous presumption. But do not tell me I was not being teased, because it flatters me to think I was.

As I said before, I am not a disinterested reviewer, and, consequently, I will not try to give credit where credit is due. Instead, I think I will reserve my comments for my favorite performances rather than for the good ones.

Clive Veroni's repeat performance as Vic's answer to Heinrich Himmler, Beak Unhealthytalk, was by far my favorite. Veroni's endearing performance brought back fond memories and left me misty-eyed for the good old days editing The Strand.

Ian Robson's portrayal of The Strand editor was adequate, but he did not show the streak of stubbornness or the one-sided perspective that has always been a trait of the editors of the campus's only sensible newspaper. Robson was, however, almost dashing and handsome enough for the part.

Jane Gardner's performances were also remarkably eye-catching. I was happy my girlfriend could not make it for this year's Bob, because I was spared getting poked in the ribs while gawking at Jane stroking her brown-overall-clad hips. But the nice thing about Jane is that, as pleasing as she is to watch, she is pleasing to listen to. She has a powerful, gutsy voice. I bet the guys at Burwash Hall, even though they cosy up two to a room, would give their bottom-dollar to have her give them a midnight serenade as part of the Vic tuck-in service.

Robin Wardlaw returned to NAB 3 this year and brought back his special touch of class to this year's Bob. The Amazing Fred Derf was, indeed, amazing. But more amazing was Mr. Wardlaw's analysis of the cultural significance of Derf's imitation of bacon frying at 340F. I agree that the dialectic implications of Derf's performance are most significant.

Wardlaw and his co-writers for the sketch — Chris Decker, Rob Yates and Kat Forster — should join the People Against Oppression and State Organized Organizations, with whom they have much in common.

I warned that I would pick personal favorites. But, I will depart a moment from that approach to say that the whole cast did a great job. If I tried to give credit to all of them by name, I would have an impossibly long list. This year's cast, if my memory serves me well, was larger than in recent years past as was this year's stable of writers.

I have one-complaint, however. I think the Bob has grown too big for its britches, because NAB 3 did not have enough seats for all of the rabid Bob fans like myself.

Mismatched Shaw

The Trinity College Dramatic Society's recent production of Shaw's Arms and the Man was not exceptional, but solid and entertaining. An old grizzled soldier (Doug Beattie) has his life saved in a Serbo-Bulgarian war at the turn of the century by a pretty young girl (Robin Campbell). Alas, the girl has strong connections with his enemies — her father, a general, (Randle Wilson) and her betrothed (Peter Matthews). True love will have its way, though, and from there the plot sickens.

For the most part the acting was quite acceptable, although rather stiff. No one appeared ignorant of the characters they were to portray, though there were differing degrees of ease and suitability in the roles. Campbell and Beattie are to be commended for their renditions. Matthews, as the girl's original fiancé, was adequate, as was Corine Pever as the servant Louka. Randle Wilson seemed unsuited to his role of a Bulgarian general, perhaps because of his flaming red hair and English accent.

The costumes and sets were not consistent within the period or the play itself, and detracted from the presentation. A fine old table was matched, in a bedroom scene, with a thoroughly modern bed; likewise, a similar problem existed with regard to the choice of costumes. Some were dazzling, but seen beside more mundane articles of modern dress their effect was lost.

A credible first effort both for this year's TCDS and director Misty Ingraham.

Jago lets go & flies high Dancer sidesteps image

In less than a week Mary Jago has been a capricious but charming young woman, a narcissistic and emotionally fraught mother and a beautiful but chilling, immortal temple dancer. That's enough to send anyone else into analysis for years but, it all comes naturally in the course of Jago's job as a principal dancer with The National Ballet of Canada (NBC).

The NBC ends its brief 1977 fall season tomorrow. Since last Saturday, Jago has respectively danced Swanilda in Erik Bruhn's Coppelia, Louise in Ann Ditchburn's Mad Shadows and Nikiya in Marius Petipa's Bayaderka (Act IV: Kingdom of the Shades) as well as other smaller roles.

A week ago last Tuesday, in the frenzy of rehearsals, Mary Jago was pressed for time to breathe let alone talk about herself and the classical dance.

She was however her usual energetic and amiable self and made every effort to squeeze some sense of order and serenity into the Emergency Room atmosphere by profusely apologizing for a sporadic interview. Moreover, while sitting on the edge of her seat ready to dash off at a moment's notice, Jago gave the situation her full attention.

Accessible and candid, Jago comes from Sussex, England where she was educated in the classical dance both by a local teacher and, for three years, at the Royal Ballet School. She joined the NBC in 1966 at 20 and this is her seventh year as a principal.

For Jago, as for other ballet dancers across the world, the capacity to take on a great diversity of roles and frequently have to perform them back-to-back is an unquestioned part of the job. Jago would bluntly say to any youngster contemplating a future in ballet, "It's a hard life."

The classical ballet places more demands upon the individual than any other field and there is no career which so relentlessly requires continued strict discipline and physical stamina. Dancers like athletes must practice at least six days per week but unlike athletes they don't have seasons. No actor would for example be subjected to playing so many diverse roles in such a short time and the classical musician who must play a multitude of arduous symphonies has both a score to read and an instrument to work for him. The dancer's instrument is his or her body and, in the final analysis, there is little with which to compare the merciless, godawful pain that dancers necessarily face day after day.

LACK OF CONFIDENCE

One of Jago's colleagues, principal dancer Karen Kain has said that the pain is excruciating and Jago would probably be one of the first to agree as well as to add that worry over injury is also prominent in the dancer's life. Whereas Jago has had her share of injuries, accepted the physical pain a long time ago and now constantly looks forward to performing in new ballets, she came very close to giving the whole thing up a few years back.

The major hurdle that Jago had to overcome in remaining a classical ballet dancer was to play the role that should have been the easiest for her to perform: herself.

"I think it was a big insecurity complex," said Jago. "I could see my contemporaries around me were progressing and I didn't feel I was getting as far as they were. I started to feel very desperately insecure and I felt like my artistic staff were not enthusiastic about my work. I really got to the point where I thought I would actually stop. I really didn't think I was going to make it."

and inhibiting for a performing artist but typical in the realm of human experience. Everywhere she turned she had doubts about herself and Jago saw she was losing control of her life when she began to think "gosh, I don't know if I can walk down the street today" or when she found herself "absolutely petrified" of going out on stage.

Dancers however have very little free time and that which they do have is more likely to be spent doing necessary chores like laundry or, more happily, visiting with friends. Above all they can't afford the luxury of spending hours in therapy. This is probably why, more often than not, artistic directors and choreographers also list among their credentials the ability to act as surrogate parents, psychiatrists and stand-up comics as well as artistic mentors.

VIGOROUS NEW ATTITUDE

Jago was fortunate. She was born with qualities that choreographers, arriving from outside the company first, began to notice and use. She may have been shy and painfully insecure but she was not mediocre.

"Apparently a lot of people when they see me, see a very ethereal quality because it's happened on several occasions now," she said. "And apparently from out front, and I don't know, this is what I've been told." Jago elaborated, "people see a lightness in my work and apparently it's very eerie at times."

It is because of these assets that two and three years ago Jago was cast in roles like Prayer and Swanilda in Coppelia and the Lady in White in Don Juan. "I think it was thanks to people like Eric (Bruhn) and Rudi (Rudolf Nureyev) who encouraged me and gave me parts to do and showed that they had faith in me," she explained. "That gave me the encouragement to continue and help me, slowly over the years I got my confidence back."

Today's Mary Jago, a mature but jubilant 31, has replaced terror with hope. "In all honesty I can say now I'm not (petrified)," she asserted. Her past nervousness has given way to a new inner tranquility. "I'm calm and I'm happy when I'm on stage now."

Although she may not be technically perfect at a given performance, Jago said it was highly probable that she would still enjoy the dancing. "The perfection is not to have everything go well but to give a good performance for your audience," she pointed out. "That's the most important thing."

Jago's vigorous new attitude has surely come in part from her association with Bruhn and Nureyev. Having worked with both men very closely, she also had time to observe the two masters' temperaments and described them as being radically different.

Speaking of Bruhn, Jago said with considerable admiration, "I've had a lot of opportunities to work with him and I think it's his continuing eagerness for us to do well, to improve—I found myself being drawn to him a lot. She added, "I just felt I wanted to work for him. He did so much for us that I feel the more he's around the more I want to do for him."

Nureyev on the other hand left Jago, both inspired and overwhelmed. "Rudolf has his strange way of saying things," explained Jago. "He'd go days without saying anything and then he'd come to me and say 'you did such and such in a performance four days ago. The reason you can't do it is because of this.' And, I'd go out the next day and try that and it would work. He'd be right."

Jago was impressed with Nureyev's fierce dedication to the dance. "Rudi is fantastic the way he works. I've never seen anyone push himself almost beyond the point." It gave her more incentive and although she doesn't push herself as hard as does Nureyev, she has definitely been breaking more ground in the last couple of years than ever before.

JAGO BRANCHES OUT

Jago is expansive. Not only does she want to try new roles, like Juliet in Romeo and Juliet, but she is also keen to appear as a guest artist with other companies. She has already guested with the Royal Winnipeg Ballet and next month she will travel for the second time to the Rhode Island Ballet Theatre, on this occasion to perform in a new production of The Nutcracker.

"I'm just very interested in all sorts of different types of movement now and I'm always interested to try it," she stated. "Even if I'm not good at it I'd just like to try it to see what it feels like and see how I can relate some of those movements to some of my own classical movements."

Branching out into contemporary works like Ditchburn's Mad Shadows and James Kudelka's A Party has been a welcome and enriching experience. The role of Louise and the whole concept of Mad Shadows excited Jago a great deal. "I loved doing the ballet. It was murder to rehearse. We've had a few accidents, a few problems, but now that we've done it so much it comes quite easily."

In Mad Shadows, Louise does a pas de deux with her lover Lanz that revolves around his cane and incorporates some perilous looking acrobatics. Jago disclosed that the cane used for rehearsals was padded with a lot of foam but she nevertheless acquired many bruises on her arms and legs. "It's fine now," she revealed. "Actually, most of the time I barely even touch that cane. The weight of my body is never really on it. You see, I support myself with my own arms. It's deceiving in many ways."

There are other forms of modern movement that Jago would like to attempt and she lit up like a Victoria Day sparkler with the mention of jazz. "I've taken a few jazz classes. They're super. Love it, love it," she exclaimed. "In fact, I'd love for the company to do a jazz ballet because I'd love to try that. I think that would be a real challenge."

Mary Jago has left herself open to many challenges and because she expressed clear exuberance over the prospects for self-enrichment, when she finally did rush off to rehearse yet another ballet, you forgot about the pain of dancing and were left only with a trail of the joy.

In every dream home....

With Captain Alexander Grant at the wheel, The National Ballet of Canada (NBC) sailed triumphantly out of the harbour and into its second quarter century last week. The company's first two performances of the fall season at O'Keefe Centre, Thursday, November 17 and Friday the 18th, are testimony to both a talented crew and a solid structure that right now look as if they could weather any conditions.

Because the season is a tribute to dancer-choreographer Erik Bruhn, the NBC opened with his production of the 19th century comic classic, Coppelia.

On Thursday, Karen Kain danced Swanilda, a young woman whose fiancée Franz has become enchanted with Coppelia, a life-sized wax doll he believes to be a real woman. Among other qualities, Kain is known for her remarkable ballon (head to toe), impeccable phrasing of steps and a sincerely charming sweetness. All these assets were present in vibrant force but, Kain resorted to an overabundance of child-like pouting in her interpretation. It's becoming something of a standard with Kain (I kept having flashbacks of La Fille Mal Gardée) and she would do well to take a fresh look at Swanilda who is married in the second act and should be portrayed with more maturity.

Frank Augustyn as Franz however showed more buoyancy and confidence than he usually does on stage and admirably sketched the cocky young lad who is also characterized by immaturity and fickleness.

A recurring problem with Augustyn's performance was his hesitation before each difficult variation for what looked like a hardy breath of air. I don't know whether Augustyn has lung troubles but these pauses disrupted the continuity of his dancing and only served to remind us of how much energy it does require — hardly a factor to be brought out.

Augustyn's second solo variation in the second act should be mentioned because whereas his first variation suffered from awkward landings, he came back to demonstrate a spirited attack of both turns and entrechats.

Coppelia, the object of Franz' wandering affections is the splendid creation of none other than Dr. Coppelius, a pathetic and eccentric old genius, who Erik Bruhn himself brought to life and light. Bruhn's arthritic Dr. Coppelius begged for empathy. The loneliness of this tottering, pigeon-toed old man, dressed in rags and mis-matched socks more out of madness than poverty, was made painfully real.

Bruhn's Coppelius provided a striking contrast to the young lovers and this interpretation has greatly transformed the nature of Coppelia as a purely comic ballet. Swanilda, who tricked Coppelius into believing the doll had come to life, and Franz, who with his friends pushed and mocked the man, were both made to look like, if not evil provocateurs, then, at least, agents of youth's cruelty through ignorance. What Bruhn has done is add another dimension to Coppelia and those who expected to only be entertained, were made to think and probably left the theatre a little confused.

On the following night, Vanessa Harwood performed Swanilda and I preferred her dramatic interpretation because she made Swanilda more sophisticated but no less captivating. Her dancing was on the whole inconsistent and where for example she performed a brilliantly seductive variation as Coppelia with the fan Coppelius had given her, she had considerable difficulty in establishing a series of pirouettes in the second act.

The big surprise of Friday night was Franz, Peter Schaufuss, who was breathtaking. Schaufuss, who was educated in the Bournonville tradition which reverses the male dancer rather than ignores him, showed the audience what the Bournonville tradition is all about.

Schaufuss' leaps were spell bindingly high; his landings plush and firm. Although Franz has never been much of a vehicle for the male dancer, Schaufuss injected the role with a bold vitality by filling in his leaps and turns as well as adding polish through his gracious pluri de bras.

Schaufuss made the audience realize why Swanilda had fallen in love with this fickle peasant lad and although his Franz could be dramatically refined — there were moments when he appeared more of a country bumpkin than peasant villager — it was Schaufuss' first time dancing the role and he was stunning.

Fuzzy furry flop

A paissano of mine I'll call Bruno (why not, that's his name), thinks Gino Vannelli is pyjamo d'agato. To quote: "Ay, to get a chick, ya take her home, turn down the lights, put on a little Gino . . . then poom!" And that pretty well sums up the career of this musical bearskin rug. The guy just oozes raw sensuality (his newest disc Pauper in Paradise gummed up my turntable and stained the rug. But hey Gino, don't you know that you can't sustain a career solely on the basis of a sensual sound, image and lyrics? If you don't believe me ask . . . Carly Simon?

Vannelli's earlier albums dealt with similar humid themes, but unlike this one had a fresh and unpretentious air about them. But by now he's exhausted all the concept's possibilities, leaving him the choice of becoming redundant, satirical, or abandoning it entirely. He's opted for the first. Disappointing really, because he has the potential to become the Burt Reynolds of rock music, poking fun at his own sexual image as well as the ideas of others. Instead he turns out fetid grunge like "Valleys of Valhalla" with the lyrics "Feel the fire-you inspire-take me to the Valleys of Valhalla" (three guesses what valley he's talking about, spud), which is humorous in a sappy sort of non-intentional way, but it becomes grating when you realize that the writer's three favourite words are passion-fire-desire because that's the scope of his vocabulary.

Musically the album is bat guano. This owes much to the fact that Vannelli's fine voice is wasted on this self-penned junk. It also stems from the fact that instrumentally, there's nothing on this album you haven't heard the band do before. The sultry Latin inspired rhythms; the song's restriction to two speeds: fast and slow; and the synthesizer man's insistence on doing nothing more than beweeep-bweeep for the whole album, are all as old as last year's white painters pants and striped rugger shirts.

The big music biz hype about Pauper in Paradise is that side two is Vannelli's first attempt at classical music. That's right, classical as in recorded by the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra, done in four movements, replete with multi-layer boredom. He probably promised it to Mama Vannelli on her deathbed or something, so play it once, forgive him, then pour Kray-Z-Gloo between the grooves. Not only is it bad, but I've personally never cared for some groups' attitude that "Our fans will have to grow with us". Vannelli has staked his claim on the gonads of the record buying public, so he ought to at least live up to their expectations.

The problem with the "New Wave" phenomena in popular music, is that it tends to force any new band to utilize this nomenclature in order to gain attention. Most of the bands so labelled don't deserve it. The Chimney recently signed five bands to play their club, all under the same management deal, and all from out of town. They have all been labelled as "New Wave" or punk bands, although only two or three of them fall under even the broadest definitions of punk.

The Johnny Barnes Band is the third in this series, and they are definitely not punks. Instead they are more of that grand and glorious tradition of British boogie bands like Foghat, Status Quo and Savoy Brown. Bands that in some obscure way took the STAX rhythm and blues sound of people like Otis Redding and converted that sound by dropping the horns and adding electric guitars. The revised sound lacks something in terms of subtlety, but gains immensely in terms of pure energy.

The logistics of the boogie band are characteristically a lead guitar, a rhythm guitar, electric bass and drums. The sound is spare: a simple and repetitive beat, short and sleazy guitar solos and sexual but insignificant lyrics. The differences in sound between bands of this nature is relatively unimportant. But the excitement comes from the passion and power with which they play this banal music. If they play it with the simple-minded enthusiasm it requires, then it transcends the inherent simplicity of the medium.

The Johnny Barnes Band made an attempt to transcend this simplicity, and at least partially failed but in a manner that makes me believe that Barnes himself (though not the whole band) will someday lead a great boogie band. The band was generated in the "jungleland-type" environment in the factory towns just outside of Boston, only slightly less cruel an environment than the Asbury Park which produced Springsteen. Barnes reveals the sort of street feel which comes out of that situation, and he expresses it in a macho style. He's a good vocalist and guitar player and has a powerful stage presence but he gets little support from those around him. His rhythm guitarist was very poor and acted like a wet rag on stage, his keyboard player was not needed and did not play with the ability or passion that would make one reconsider his utility. The bass player was adequate (that's all you require in a boogie band's bass player) and only the drummer showed any passion or energy. The music that Barnes writes does not require keyboards, and their presence detracts from the simple drive that band strives for. If he realized this and also got a slightly more enthused rhythm guitarist he would make good music. He himself has the passion to communicate well these simple musical ideas.

God's Favorite

The New College Dramatic Guild commenced its season this last weekend with an unfamiliar Neil Simon play, God's Favorite. Although riddled with the usual Simon wit, the subject matter is slightly unorthodox (in one sense, that is), as it deals with a wealthy and devout manufacturer whose faith is tested as he loses all his worldly goods only to keep his worthless son.

It wasn't, unfortunately, all that well done. The only acting which was credible was that of God's messenger, employed at $137 per week to perform the unpalatable tasks usually reserved for guardian angels. The play itself trots in many unavoidable clichés but something more subtle than melodrama might have been achieved.

The hall in which the play was performed does not lend itself to drama; but the set and properties weren't helpful either. A forest of pillars in a living room were superfluous reminders of elegance. And the explosions could have been done without mind-numbing impairment of the audience's sight and breathing. Perhaps the effect was unnecessary? The accompanying music was well-played but non-essential. This assessment is undoubtedly coloured by seeing the play in the context of alien bodies putting on an infrequently-played script. If one had been a member of New College, and known those involved, a more positive judgement could be made; to the outsider, though, there wasn't much in it.

A scene from Goethe's Faust, in Barker Fairley's translation, which was presented last week at the Studio Theatre. The play was ambitious, difficult for its audience mainly due to its inordinate length. We regret that a longer review was not possible, and extend apologies to director Allan Park and his cast.

Free-form madness falls flat

Theatre Second Floor is presenting an improvisational drama, Jekyll play Hyde, for the month of November. Three actors base an hour of loosely organized drama on lines taken from Robert Louis Stevenson's short story, Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde. The actors are not completely free to follow their inclinations as a structure of sorts has been imposed to present certain basics of plot and provide some coherence. The actors are free, though, to respond in different ways to a different situation each night, and to stress and underplay different aspects of the story.

The pure terror that is evident in the book or in film versions is not evident in this presentation. The mean streak in Hyde came through clearly only once when he trampled an imaginary feeding pigeon. The tensions of London streets at night for the participants are present but they do not overwhelm. Perhaps the most clearly presented element of all was the ever-present need of Jekyll and Hyde for drugs to continue existence.

There is always the possibility that there might be a great deal of difference between the levels of operation of the reviewer and the levels of those involved in the production. In other words, I was bewildered initially, lost interest, and then questioned my presence at the theatre. It would seem that this presentation would be best appreciated by the so-called "in crowd" of Toronto theatre. The more one knows about the subject, the theatre generally as well as specifically, the greater the benefits to be derived. Although this principle can be easily applied to most things, nonetheless there should be some consideration given to those not totally involved. To someone who is not well-connected some other show might give more of lasting value.

The diddlings of J. Joyce, esq.

(James Joyce in Padua, ed., transl., commentary, intro. by Louis Berone, Random House, Hardcover, $9.95)

Reader, your correspondent is pissed off — royally pissed off. Why, you ask? Well, I'll tell you.

This summer in preparing for my duties this fall as literary editor I looked through various catalogues for books which looked worth requesting for review. One of these was James Joyce in Padua, which sounded truly fascinating: two previously unpublished essays by Joyce, written during his stay in Padua, with critical and biographical commentary. Promising. I ordered the book.

Reader, the Joyce essays occupy about ten pages of the text, and they represent a post-graduate exam Joyce wrote at the University of Padua, one essay on the renaissance and another on Dickens. They are not bad postgraduate essays — a very indulgent prof. might give them an A, a stern one a B. But Louis Berone devotes sixty pages to gushing over the achievements of these two fucking essays, and their relation to the prose of Portrait of the Artist and Ulysses. Sixty utterly uncritical pages — he never so much as questions any of the assumptions Joyce makes although many of the assumptions are highly questionable, and Joyce like many another student flying quickly through a test essay question makes many more generalizations than he takes time to clarify, qualify, verify or defend: "Shakespeare and Lope de Vega are responsible, to a certain point, for cinematography. The untiring creative force, the hot and lively passionate temperament, the intense desire to see and sense, and excessive and diffuse curiosity degenerate after three centuries into frenetic sensationalism." Oh yeah? (These two sentences are a reasonable index to the style of both essays as well, and it is amazing to me how badly a fellow can write on a postgraduate exam and still turn out to be James Joyce in the end. Should prove an inspiration to us all.)

The essay on Dickens could have been truly memorable, since there are marks of Dickens' style and prose innovation everywhere in Joyce. Dickens is probably the first novelist in English to use interior monologue

— the only prior claimant I can plausibly see an argument for is Laurence Stern, and his experiments are more like flip interior dialogues with imaginary readers. And I know of no-one before Dickens who used exterior landscape to parallel and penetrate the inner landscape of a character's psyche, or who animated a landscape itself with something very much like a character or life of its own here and there, and many of his own further experiments in style as a means of psychological penetration may have begun with ideas set going by his reading of Dickens.

But Joyce never talks about Dickens' style in his Padua essay.

What he does instead is again to indulge in quick generalizations in order to make snap points in his rapid-motion thesis: "Anything drearier, and therefore less Dickensian, than the American chapter of Martin Chuzzlewit it would be hard to imagine. If Dickens is to move you, you must not allow him to stray out of hearing of the chimes of Bow Bells." Now whether either of these assertions, or any of the other three-dozen-odd generalities in Joyce's lightning assessment of the place of Dickens in the literary firmament, are accurate is quite beside the point, although I question personally these assumptions and almost every other one Joyce makes about Dickens and about the Renaissance. The real point is that these quick, engaging, superficial thumbnail sketches of culture drawn to specification under the examiner's sharp eye are adequate post-graduate literary criticism, nothing more, and would be nothing more if they were penned by Swift, Ben Johnson and Dostoyevsky in congeries. They do not illuminate the career of Joyce, nor his achievements, and do not add so much as a phrase of value to the canon of his works. To throw them between the covers of a book with sixty pages of slavish critical explication, forty-plus pages of footnotes, facsimile of the exams themselves in Joyce's handwriting, and divers photographs of Joyce and associates in Padua, is not literary scholarship but an imposition on the curious reader, and the memory of Joyce. That's why I'm pissed off.

Martin Heaviesides

More Joycean juvenelia

—see the opening of Bleak House, and even more spectacularly the scene near the end of the novel where a number of his upper-middle class characters are finally confronted with Tom-All Alone's, which seethes reels, hallucinatory, before the mind's eye, by which means he renders without describing the extreme inflection left on the psyche of his characters by this monstrous vision. And Dickens was, so far as I know, the first in the novel to evoke simultaneously both the mass psychology of a crowd and simultaneously the flickers of unique response on the part of individuals within the crowd. Joyce borrowed many of these resources; it would be a mistake to say he refined them—they are already refined to a positively fearful degree in the later novels of Dickens — he did expand their uses

Demythologizing Mahatma

Ved Mehta: Mahatma Gandhi and his apostles: Viking Press, New York, 1977; 260 pp. (Hardcover $17.95, Penguin paperback $3.50).

Mohandas Karamchand Gandhi, also known as the Mahatma (great soul), was a cross between Christ, Metternich, Buddha, and Mohammad. He is one of the extraordinarily strange characters on the stage of history.

He was a man deeply involved in a personal quest for nirvana-moksha and freedom from maya (illusion), in the ideal eastern classical tradition; the simple life style he adopted to facilitate his "experiments in truth" in the experiential world has defined the mode of life which is now regarded as the lot of all Indian politicians. It was he who skillfully welded the aspirations of the Indian elite to a mass movement and forced the political weapon of 'civil disobedience', and by wielding this tool, which could be employed with equal effect by all members of a highly fragmented society, led his country to freedom. What he thought out loud about public and private issues has congealed in the rhetoric of all the major parties — The Congress and the Janata both claim to be adherents of Gandhian ideology. His thinking even influenced foreign leaders like Martin Luther King.

The multiplicity of the images of Gandhi inevitably poses questions in our minds, questions that are more irritating for his having lived but thirty years ago. We, as Albert Einstein had prophesied, belong to the generation that "will scarce believe that such a one as this ever in flesh and blood walked this earth."

The myth of Gandhi, "partly true and partly fiction", has come to dwarf the man. Ved Mehta in this book, his ninth, has sought to "demythologize" Gandhi and explore the "subtler and more lasting shapes" that he assumed in the memories of his disciples. Some four hundred biographies of Gandhi have already been written, as the author himself informs us; but, except for a few notable works, most of them are in the hagiographic tradition and therefore of limited use in understanding a man whose thought is experiencing a renaissance in India today.

Ved Mehta is able to document graphically Gandhi's personal development: from the most ordinary background, Gandhi experiences a need to radically transform his self, and become a pilgrim on his quest of truth. Neither this nor his identification with all things in creation is any different from the experiences of many others. However, unlike others, who have used such feelings to retreat into 'quietism', Gandhi immerses himself in action. Political repression and inequality, first in South Africa and later in India, lead him to throw himself into a ceaseless struggle.

It would appear that Gandhi, through his acts, did secure his salvation. Certainly the educated and the not-so-well-educated who worship him as an avatar (incarnation) of God would agree that he was successful in his efforts.

It is not as 'easy to gauge his success as a political leader. He, by himself, created the paradigm of national leadership in India. One can say that his predecessors drew their strength from limited, sectional appeal. Gandhi's appeal was universal, and so provided an example to all who followed. His use of civil disobedience helped determine the nature of almost all political struggle in India to the present day. It could be argued that the Bihar movement, led by Jayaprakash Narayan, which undermined Mrs. Gandhi's regime, owed its success, in part to the public's familiarity with this mod of protest. Though unable to prevent the division of India to create a separate homeland for its Muslim population, Gandhi was able to force a guarantee for the minority rights of those Muslims who chose to remain in India.

But the society Gandhi dreamed of creating arrived still born. Since he fell to an assassin's bullet (1948) his disciples have built innumerable shrines and institutions in his memory, named many roads and buildings in his honour, dutifully remembered him on Independence Day, and tearfully gathered to take their oaths of office at the spot his body was cremated; but, his concern for the social outcasts, the poverty stricken, and his passionate belief in non-violence has been scattered in the wind with his ashes.

Roxie in Roseland: the golden age regilt

The key word for this piece is nostalgia. Nostalgia signifies a complex of ideas and responses which are somehow tied together and befogged by the single label. It is a word almost always found in reviews of films made about a time long since gone. You'll find it here too, lurking.

Roxie Hart was made in 1942 but its major action is set in the autumn of 1926. To view the film today is to make a double leap, once to the sensibility of those who made the film and again to the era to which they had moved themselves.

Roseland, on the other hand is a movie made in 1977, which is concerned with the present, but only with a portion of the present which has been frozen into a style of the past. It focuses on the Roseland Ballroom, the most famous dancehall in the world and the people whose dreams fill it every night.

Superficially there is little in common between the two films. Roxie Hart is upbeat, satirical and is only marginally concerned with three dimensional characters. We are presented with the old cynical newshound bent on landscaping his molehill of a story, with the cub-reporter who falls in love with the 'murderess', with corrupt lawyers of all shapes and sizes, and with the faceless lechery of the jury, with the publicity-grubbing judge, and with Roxie Hart, the unemployed dancer who is willing to chance the gallows for the publicity her trial will give her. They're all characters about whom we know everything the moment they appear on the screen. Even their collisions are predictable, and follow the hierarchical lines which form the society of Chicago. The interest of the movie is generated by the moment to moment energy with which everyone fills his or her role, and by the inexorable movement of the society toward yet another travesty of justice.

Roseland, however, is interested in 'real' people. The figures who populate the three vignettes which make up the film may be drawn from stereotypes but a conscious attempt has been made to individuate them. We have the Gigolo, the Old Widow, the Fading Dancer, the Sweet Young Thing, the Incompetent Old Man, the Charwoman Who Dreams . . . But these must become actual enough to us to grasp our sympathy. Without this sympathy Roseland is a slightly embarrassing movie about a bunch of losers which is always plunging in and out of purest bathos.

The first of the three tales is a complete disaster. Its plot runs headlong against the realistic setting which is so carefully built up. The dreams animating Roseland's dancers are very real to them but when they take palpable form the story runs off into the hinterland of the Brothers Grimm to become third-rate fairy tale. It is also encumbered by a needless voice-over which so mis-shapes the narrative as to render it formless.

The second is rather better, and the third, a tale of two old people, a man who has accepted his failures and plugs away at a life which his spirit makes enjoyable, and a woman who cannot forget her dreams of aristocracy, who changes from charwoman to dowager empress the moment she enters the dancehall, is a remarkable instance of cinematic tact and taste. The subject could easily have turned farcical or maudlin. But the pair, whose greatest desire is to die changing, retain their dignity and emerge as intensely believable portraits of people coping with age, and coming to terms with the past.

It is in coming to terms with the past that these two dissimilar movies link themselves. Roxie Hart is structured around the narration of a reporter, who was young when the case was in the papers and is hedging into middle-age as he tells the tale. He laments the dullness of the murders in Chicago 'nowadays' — the past, with its gang-wars, corrupt judiciary and pretty murderesses (all acquitted: 'you couldn't swing Lucretia Borgia in this town') is infinitely superior to the present.

This theme dominates the lives of all the characters in Roseland (excepting one young couple who are in the process of living a past they may look back on in fifteen years). The difference in tone is, however, immense. And this difference is not simply rooted in the fact that the movies have widely variant subjects. The separation is the result of a change in attitude towards the world at large, and memory in small.

The reporter in Roxie Hart has had his dreams come true and found them to be less than he'd hoped. The bartender has lost everything (in the crash of '29). The rest of the men at the bar are dripping wet and shivering and a more haggard group of faces have rarely found their way to the screen. Outside there is November rain, and further outside there is a war. The memories of 1926 are those of the Golden Age.

The Roseland Ballroom too has fallen. It is almost an anachronism. The only young people there are gigolos and a few who study with instructors so as to have more stuff to strut at the disco down the street. The atmosphere is one of fallen gentility. And, although there are no flashbacks, the remembrance of a better past is as much a pretense as the walls or the chandeliers.

The past which is conjured in Roxie Hart is sharply edged and perfectly observed. No golden haze covers the foibles and the corruption. What is evoked is the tremendous energy of pre-depression America. What the narrator regrets is a Chicago in which everything, from the papers, through the shysters in the judiciary to the murderers themselves worked on a grand scale. It is a loss but it's not idealised, perhaps because the present, although low-keyed and not to the old one's tastes, does hold something.

This is not the case in Roseland where the Golden Age is lost forever and the present is only a shadow. Every character in the movie talks about what they have lost with the passage of time — beauty, youth, opportunity, husband, wife . . . and no one has any sense that it might be better in the future.

The shift in attitude is impossible to ignore. It may be presumptuous to generalize from two dissimilar films chosen at random or to compare a great film from the forties with a serious but marginal film which is in first-run in 1977. But even allowing these, questions are begged. Could Roxie Hart be made today? Or have we sacrificed its acute feel for the spirit of a given time to a non-specific sense of loss. Roseland is an elegy for a time that was but is no longer (if, indeed, there ever was such a time). The old lament their lost youth, the middle-aged feebly attempt to recapture their lost youth, and the young are paralysed by the opportunities which have already slipped past. If there were new-born babes in Roseland they'd be elegising the womb.

Perhaps this is characteristic only of this film but I wonder if (and here the writer lapses into the disease he describes) our ability to focus our sense of the present hasn't failed and lost us any clear knowledge of the past as anything other than a time that is not now.

Brian O'Nolan

Herschel likes Styx concert

Last Thursday Styx brought progressive rock to the masses at Maple Leaf Gardens.

The band's vocals shone all night long, aided largely by a clean, crisp mix and a fine sound system (with the speakers suspended instead of at stage level). James Young expelled favourites like "Midnight Ride" and "Miss America" (the first encore) while Tommy Shaw dove into such songs as "Fooling Yourself" and "Crystal Ball". Physically, they provided a curious contrast, with Tommy's pixie-ish proportions complementing J.Y.'s booted height.

STYX is a five-man semi-progressive band. Their first three albums went through the classic "great-reviews-but-no-airplay" syndrome. When their fourth album, "The Serpent Is Rising" hit the racks, radio station WLS in Chicago started to get requests for "Lady", a song oddly enough, from their second album. The single was hastily re-released (shades of Aerosmith's "Dream On") and soon became a national hit.

1975 saw Styx shift to A&M, where they proceeded to record their gold album "Equinox" (from which "Lorelei" was culled). Immediately after, guitarist Rick Curlewski left the band to be replaced by the newest Stygian, Tommy Shaw.

The Styx sound was dominated by the keyboards and vocals of Dennis De Young, the guitar of James Young, and Tommy Shaw's lead guitar and southern lyrics. Twin brothers Chuck and John Panozzo provided a tight rhythm section of bass and drums.

A second encore saw Styx return decked out in Toronto Maple Leaf hockey sweaters to grind out a good 'ole fashion, kick-in-the-television rocker called "Born For Adventure."

Prism went through the usual sound hassles that warm-up acts encounter, but still showed virtually no promise for the future. To put it simply, they sounded like a hundred other loud mindless rock bands in the Artful Dodger-Nazareth-Widowmaker vein.

jazz

Hello Jazz Fans! Don't miss the Kathy Moses Quartet at Hart House on Wednesday next week, 12-2 p.m. Kathy is an excellent flautist who can convey excitement and tension in her performances like few other artists on that instrument can. Her unique pelvic thrust is also highly esteemed by the critics.

Now that I've got the opportunity, I should mention that the Hart House concerts have been superb this season, bringing in some of the finest talent in the city. In recent weeks we've heard pianists Frank Falco and Ted Moses, bassists Dave Young and Dave Plitch, trumpeter Sammy Noto, and saxophonists Jane Fair, Eugene Amaro, Harvey Kogen and Steve Lederer. Many thanks to organizer Richard Liss for these aural feasts.

The big band sound of Bob McConnell's Boss Brass continues to boom at Basin Street until Dec. 3. Cover $4, weekends $5.

Trumpeter Blue Mitchell toots the blues away this week and next at Bourbon St. What can be said about this man that hasn't been said already?

At George's, the Russ Little Quartet finishes Saturday, followed on Monday by Bernie Senensky and his trio.

The Jimmy Maxwell Quintet (trumpet) blows at DJ's tonight and Saturday, with the Chuck Wayne Trio (guitar) taking over on the 28th.

Catch the Frank Falco Sextet with Jane Fair tonight and Saturday after lunch at Cafe Soho, 334 Queen W. Good Music, perfect atmosphere. 862-0199.

This Sunday the progressive jazz group Weather Report will perform at Convocation Hall. Shows at 6:30 and 9:00 p.m. Tickets are $6.50 for the public, $5 for students, available at SAC.

Tonight: Lumiere opens the week with Resnais' Stavisky which allows us all to see that what might have been was boring in Last Year at Marienbad was, in truth, the exciting side of the director's personality. It's coupled with Alain Tanner's The Middle of the World which purports to be about banal love and political neutrality. There's nothing neutral about the animal show at the New Yorker where you too can watch A Clockwork Orange cavort with A Boy and His Dog. For more seriousness you can head to the Science Centre to watch Marguerite Duras' India Song which is about suffering women and the fun they can have in this modern world. Le Jour Se Leve in which the nobility of love among the poor-but-honest is revealed at last, follows. The Revue has two films and a total of Seven Musketeers while the Roxy has that Toronto sweetheart The Rocky Horror Show. The three Schools has Hitchcock's Young and Innocent. The U of T Film Foax have Last Django in Gal Parez together with poor Ms. Wertmuller's much-maligned Swept Away.

Saturday: is pretty much the same except that The Rocky Horror Show shuffles over to Yonge Street to take up residence at the New Yorker. The Roxy makes up for this bereavement by importing two Hollywood glossies The Eagle Has Landed and The Deep.

Sunday: Great days and Freedom!

Roxie Hart is out of the closet at last and is showing at Innis at 8:00. I don't care how many essays you have, they can wait — there are priorities. Innis also has cartoons at 2:00 and the silent (sans Gore Vidal) version of Ben Hur. Lumiere has that endless wonder The Mommy and the Whore in which you'll hear Jean-Pierre Leaud say more French words than you knew existed.

Monday: Lumiere repeats. The New Yorker ushers in the pains of modern psychiatry with Knott (which may have helpful hints in dealing with those intransigent essay deadlines) and Hurry Tomorrow. The Revue has Truffaut demi-meets with The Wild Child and The 400 Blows.

Tuesday: The Science Centre has News from the East with New Films from The People's Republic of China. Lumiere serves up two films centred on the social problems of Britain's young, Skolimowsky's Deep End and Richardson's The Loneliness of the Long-Distance Runner. The New Yorker brings strange arts to the screen: The Magic Flute and Swan Lake. The Roxy has an odd billing of Play It Again, Sam and Harold and Maude. And The Revue closes out the week with Rebecca.

Snappy dresser Jose Feliciano will be at Hamilton Place on Dec. 5th.

On the club circuit, the immortal Kleekin' is at the immortal Tube. Prairie Oyster is at the Horseshoe, Fingers is at Larry's, Johnny Barnes is at the Chimney and Pockets is at the Gasworks. Joe Hall is at the Midwich Cuckoo and some fella called B. B. King is at the Colonial. Save your hard-earned shekles and catch the up-and-coming Imps at Toronto's classiest night spot, the Yonge Station. Champagne Charlie is at the Fingerboard Cafe tomorrow.

There's nothing new on the concert circuit. Chris de Burgh, Billy Joel, Weather Report, Cano, Murray McLachlan and Rush are all up and coming. Tonight the Shock Theatre is presenting the Androids and the Toyz.

On the home front, SAC is presenting the Dutch Mason Blues Band at Dr. John's tonight. They're one of the better swinging-blues bands in the city. If you don't have the energy to drag your essay-weary carcass out the door, Gzowski is airing a Bowie film on his program tonight and on Sunday the Buck Owens Country Spectacular will hit the tube. Pull up a bag of corn-pones and make yourself comfy, neighbor. paul

The National Ballet of Canada's (NBC) Fall Season ends tomorrow but 3 performances of the same mixed program remain. Tonight at 8 p.m., tomorrow at 2 p.m. and again at 8 p.m., the National offers Jerome Robbins' sensual Afternoon of a Faun, Frederick Ashton's stunning Monotones II (based on Satie's haunting Gymnopédies) and Erik Bruhn's production of La Sylphide. This season's other guest artist Galina Samsova, a former (1961-1964) NBC member and now international performer, dances with Bruhn in Sylphide both tonight and tomorrow night. An added attraction tonight is the brilliant Peter Schaufuss in the male lead, James. Call the O'Keefe Centre Box Office for complete details at: 363-6633. If you can't get seats try standing room only.

Tonight and tomorrow night at 15 Dance Lab classical Indian dancer Rena Singha performs North Indian works and original compositions at 8:30 p.m. 115a George St. $3. Reservations a must: 869-1589.

Next week we have a typical Toronto situation—a great big splash of dancing (or little squirts all over). Thurs. thru Sat., Rimmon, a local contemporary group, descends on 15 Dance Lab (details same as above).

Also on the agenda for Dec. 1 thru 3 is the debut of The National Tap Dance Company of Canada (NTDCC) at Minkler Auditorium, Seneca College. Call the NTDCC for info: 363-5707.

Last but not least Ballet Ya presents seven ya pieces, a choreographic workshop. New works will be presented by Ys and Kitchener's "Dance Plus Four" will be on hand to perform. Dec. 1-4 at 8 p.m. and Dec. 4 at 2:30 p.m. Admission $2. Bring a cushion as the seating is limited. Ballet Ys Studio, 366 Adelaide St. East. 364-3428. kristine

art

An apology and correction 'is definitely in order for last week's confusion of the painter Kim Oondatje for her husband Mike. Readers have expressed genuine admiration for both, so that the term "nondescript cult" must be changed to "illustrious following". Our critical best to the Oondatjes.

Gadatsy Gallery opens a show of Miro Mallah's recent drawings tomorrow. Malish offers a delicate use of coloured pencil technique, mixed with form and fantasy. Till Dec. 16. Compare it to the Marc-Aurele Fortin exhibition nearby at the Gallery Moos for a sense of rural sublimity. Till Dec. 15.

Around the campus you'll notice the surge of high quality art shows. Expressive Realism has a broad appeal and R.F.M. McInnis's paintings at the Hart House Art Gallery are innovative examples. OISE features David Johnson's Gershonesque acrylics till Nov. 30. And the New Academic Building at Vic has two artists "The Incurable Illustrious", David Blostein and Allen Smutly with a collection of prints. Blostein is also an English professor at Vic and an incurable caricaturist. Till Dec. 9.

Harbourfront has resurrected a dying Polish art called Wycinanki, the art of paper cut-outs. Irene Krawczyk will demonstrate the technique on Sat. and Sun., and the show is a collection of 200 of these pieces by various artists. Till Nov. 30. In the same vein, the Merton Gallery opens on Tuesday a large exhibition of Dolls — a collection ranging from ceramic to paper, and minute to enormous. They are both for show and sale.

Isaac's Gallery has New Paintings by John MacGregor which are pleasantly nostalgic of New York abstractionists in the late 50's and early 60's. Till Dec. 10. The Pollock Gallery is showing drawings by Grant MacDonald till Dec. 8. Peter Flinsch's drawings on the theme Around the Body closes today at the Roberts Gallery.

For silkscreen finesse, visit the Gallery Pascal across from the AGO, for a fine exhibition of paintings by Toni Onley. Kim Oondatje also includes silk screens in her multimedia exhibition at the Scarborough College Gallery, till Dec. 5.

The AGO continues the Henry Moore drawings show until Dec. 31 along with paintings by Halifax artist Gerald Ferguson. Impresario Ambrose Vollard closes next Sunday so be sure to take it in. Today the AGO opens The Laurentians: Painters in a Landscape, including works by Marc-Aurele Fortin, Goodridge Roberts, Jacques de Tonnancour, Patrick Landale and others. Their renderings of the Laurentians are personal, not nationalistic in fervour.

The MacDonald Gallery in the Government Buildings continues its Japanese Canadian Centennial Art Exhibition till Dec. 4. Worth seeing, as are the watercolours of Walter Council at the Prince Arthur Galleries. Till Dec. 7.

The Sable-Castelli Gallery offers Harold Klunder, the controversial new artist intent on challenging The Painters Eleven. Till Dec. 3.

The Contemporary Ontario Glass exhibition at The Pottery Shop receives unbroken attention and can be affordable. Till Nov. 30.

Miniature Wall Hangings, embroidered and appliqued are showing at the Innuit Gallery of Eskimo Art till Dec. 3. The gallery also has running exhibitions of major Eskimo sculpture, ornaments and prints.

classical

Four interesting concerts at 8:30 tonight, but three will likely regret vying with Mstislav Rostropovich at Massey Hall. Cellist plays — or rather defines — Prokofiev's Sinfonia Concertante (composed in 1951 for Rostropovich) with the TSO under Nais. Program includes a repeat of Tuesday's Stravinsky. $5 to $15, no rush seats.

Pianist William Alde gives a standard but appealing recital of Scarlatti, Mozart, Chopin, and Liszt free in Walter Hall. The New Chamber Orchestra is joined by the Toronto Concert Singers in a Bach-Handel program in St. James's Cathedral. Tickets $6.50. In the St. Lawrence Centre's Town Hall, a young Canadian cast presents Gian-Carlo Menotti's satiric operas The Old Maid and The Thief and The Telephone. Director is Michael Bawtree, who organized the successful "Medium" production a few years back. $4 and $5.

Sunday at 3:00, pianist Ivanfai Gandos appears at the Hungarian Canadian Cultural Centre (840 St. Clair West) in a colossal Liszt program (Funerailles, the Sonata, Rhapsodies). Tickets $5. That evening at Town Hall, baritone Ingram Korjus sings a recital of Mozart, Brahms, and some Estonian numbers. Starts at seven, students $3.

The Monday afternoon's Convocation Hall organ recital features Elizabeth Gallimore and the Calvin Presbyterian Church Choir in a program of Bach, Handel, and Reger. $1 at 5:05.

This week in Massey Hall Davis and the TSO offer Ravel's Tombéau de Couperin and Brahms's German Requiem with the Mendelssohn Choir. Tuesday and Wednesday at 8:30, rush seats at 7:00. You might think about buying tickets now for the Faculty Opera Dept.'s production of Britten's Albert Herring, which opens next Friday. Student tickets are $2.50 at EJB box office.

Attention reviewers: this week is a trick — our next paper is Wednesday and all copy is to be in by Monday afternoon or a white space inscribed with your name will appear in the next paper. And accordingly, this week's listings should only cover a five-day span; but we'll see, we'll see.

And immediately we depart from that schedule. Please take note that we have it on good authority that Mr. Sheridan's last play, The Critic is to be staged by a man of consequence, none other than Herbert Whitaker, the week of January 9th under the aegis of the Drama Centre. A few male roles are still available and there will be a reading this Saturday at 2 p.m. at the Glen Morris Studio.

On campus, this week is quieter than last. But at U.C., Brecht's Drums in the Night, each evening until Sunday at 8:30 at the U.C. Playhouse, 79a St. George St. Tickets are free but reservations are advised;

call 978-6307. At St. Mike's, the Jack Players (no, Virginia, it's not a cigarette) are presenting The Ginger Man tonight and tomorrow night at 8:30 in Upper Brennan Hall. At Enrdale, in the Studio Theatre, 3359 Mississauga Road, two performances today, at 2:10 and 8:30 of Strindberg's Miss Julie under the direction of J. Wayne Spriggs. Also tomorrow evening at 8:30; tickets $2 and reservations should be made if possible by calling 828-5349.

Lacuna No. 1: Occasionally people ask about the usefulness of making reservations. I make it policy, where space and time permit, to include the box office number so you can get the correct info, on times and student prices, since they do fluctuate at times from the printed advertisements. And it's a drag when the play's in a basement downtown and it's sold out when you get to the box office and can't find another show within hailing distance. On campus, particularly, reservations are a funny business — sometimes door tickets are more than available, but at UC and the Studio there are often thirty people hoping for cancellations or no-shows. Please remember that theatre etiquette requires you to pick up reserved tickets a quarter of an hour before show-time or they need not be held for you. End of excursus.

Elsewhere on the propaganda front, I saw Cruel Tears the other night and enjoyed it for its music, just as our reviewer said. But the play must have succeeded on something else as well to get this far, and I don't suppose the cast always look like they've lived on soggy cornflakes for six weeks. Maybe touring gets you down. Interesting show, too damn expensive though. At Bathurst St. Theatre, another three weeks, Tuesday-Friday at 8:30, Saturday 5:30 and 9:30, matinee Wednesday and Sunday at 2:30; student tickets $4. Call 536-6663. At Factory Lab, 207 Adelaide St. Winter Offensive gives decadence a little extra, Tuesday-Sunday at 8:30, Sunday matinee (PWYC) at 2:30. This is the kind of play that brings back the Lord's Day Act. Perhaps Ken Cass will be charged with keeping a common bawdy house at the show you go to. Would you be a found-in?

Slightly more subtle is the propaganda element in Toronto Workshop's production of The Club, previewing next Tuesday and formally opening Thursday. The mentality of a turn-of-the-century men's club is exposed in its music and jokes, all parts being taken by women. The run will be Tuesday-Sunday at 8:30, Saturdays at 6:00 and 9:30, Sunday matinees at 2:30. It is rumored tickets will start at $4.

Reviews are hot in T.O. these days; another opens this week, 4 Do 2, which, as the Globe and Mail notes, now features an imbalanced 2, at the Bayview Playhouse, 8:30, call 487-2451. Also new is Sweet City Lights, at the Theatre in the Dell, opening tonight at 9:00, call 481-6191. Opening at Tarragon is Rudy Wiebe's Far As The Eye Can See, which moves into town with observations on Alberta land-struggles. Commencing Tuesday next at 8:00, until Sunday, with a Sunday matinee (PWYC) at 2:30. Student price $3.50, call 531-1827.

Last call for: Zastrozzi at Toronto Free, 26 Berkeley St. call 368-2856; Les Hauts et Les Bas d'la Vie d'une Diva, St. Paul's, tonight and tomorrow only, 8:30, call 466-8400.

Please note two more campus shows: The Dismal at Hart House continues, call 978-8668; and at Innis, a very interesting concept-Cabaret appears at Innis College Pub, Tuesday-Saturday next week: The doors open at 8. After one hour of serving, the show commences: admission $2.50. Check this one out.

One last plea, an obvious request to remedy an obvious deficiency in the theatre section. Is there any one interested in reviewing at Enrdale or Scarborough who'd be willing to send me a sample of your writing to judge your abilities on? We need reviewers from the suburban campuses.

A very self-indulgent watsup, for which I apologize. john

Fans Treated To Great Game

By GLYNIS PETERS

Women's basketball is not known as a spectator sport but the unusually large number of people who turned out for Tuesday's game against York will undoubtedly attend future games. The Blues gave an outstanding performance as they routed York by a score of 71-43. Coach Sharon Bradley was extremely pleased with her team's effort and refused to name any stars but credited each player with playing a terrific game.

U of T moved quickly into the lead in the first part of the game. From the start it was evident that the Blues were a well-conditioned team as they set a fast pace that would continue throughout the game. As Coach Bradley explained, "It was full-court press and fast break for the whole game. Base line to base line running showed our conditioning paying off". The fast break opportunities were capitalized on time and again. Leading the high scorers was Barb Grochowski with 19 points, followed by Jane Leuty with 15 and Sharon Kosmachuk with 13.

Toronto executed their plays well, prompting Coach Bradley to point out that, "we not only beat them but we played our game to beat them".

Near the end of the first half there seemed to be a lapse in Toronto's strong play. Losing a considerable spread they were only up by 5 points at half time. This can be attributed to a change in York's press that caught the Blues momentarily off guard. However, coming back into the second half prepared to handle this change, the team moved back to their own controlled game and took charge once more of the situation.

Going into tonight's game against Queen's Toronto has a 2-1 record, with the loss going to a strong Guelph team, who are favoured to win the Western division. Queen's have long been rivals of the Blues who are out to make up for a loss last year that went into triple overtime before the Gaels won and the last game last season where Toronto was beaten by 1 point.

Last night's victory has the Blues prepared for a good game this evening. Coach Bradley mentioned that last night's spectator support was greatly appreciated. "It was really exciting to have fan support. The crowd reaction to good plays made the team feel that they were truly playing a home game". Tonight's game will precede the men's game against Western. This double-header starts at 6 p.m. and will take place at the Benson Building and a turn out comparable to last night's will likely be treated to as exciting a game as last night's against York. Congratulations go to a fantastic team effort and good luck for tonight's encounter.

Going Down Under

By GLYNIS PETERS

Held every four years, in the year following the Olympics, the Pacific Conference Games are the first important meet before the Commonwealth Games. Dave Watt, a doctoral candidate at the U of T, will be representing Canada in the triple jump and sharing the lime-light with athletes like John Walker, Rod Dixon and Canada's finest, including Bruce Simpson, Diane Jones and Debbie Brill. Watt qualified for the meet at the Canadian Nationals when he won the Championship for the third year in a row. He presently holds the National record of 16.05 metres or 52 feet 8 inches.

While an Undergraduate at U of T, Watt divided his energies between basketball and track, doing well enough in both sports to win him the Biggs trophy as athlete of the year. After giving up basketball in 1973 he has worked under Andy Higgins and trained year round for track. At the moment he is finding it difficult to secure a place to train indoors. Gym space at U of T is hard to come by and consequently the track team is working in poor conditions until they can use the track at the C.N.E. Luckily Watt was able to spend last week in Florida in preparation for the coming meet.

Also representing U of T, but in a different capacity, will be Joe Piccinni. "Peach" goes as Head Athletic Therapist and makes up a group of only 5 officials who are accompanying the team.

Fox: A Seasoned Veteran

By ANDREW MAHON

After 5 years of college basketball, Doug Fox would dearly "like to go out with a winner."

Fox, the 6' 1" veteran guard is returning to co-captain the team with Tim McGhie, and is optimistic about the Basketball Blues' chances this season.

Fox began playing basketball at Don Mills Collegiate where he only started to play the sport seriously during his final years in high school. In fact he was not particularly sure of his basketball future when he arrived at U of T.

"When I came here I was hesitant about going out for the team, I didn't know what calibre ball there would be — but I stuck it out."

In his fourth year of phys-ed and health education, Fox is also a veteran when it comes to combining studies with basketball. In addition to the lengthy schedule of games and practices, Fox still manages to find time for hockey, refereeing and coaching the Meds basketball team.

"It's a matter of using time wisely," explains Fox, "but I find that my schoolwork comes in spurts."

The Blues have recently moved their practices from Hart House to Benson building where they play their home games — a move which Fox sees as being particularly helpful to the Blues: "It's very fortunate for conditioning and shooting," says Fox. "When we were practising in Hart House, it was like playing away games in Benson."

Except for rookies John Lam and Bill Pangos, this year's team is intact (10 of last year's players returning), a big plus according to Fox:

"This year's team looks really good. We have a lot of strength and it really means a lot to have that playing time and experience behind you."

Fox's reaction to the growing numbers of American 'stars' in the Canadian college basketball ranks is two-fold. On one hand Fox "enjoys the competition" but at the same time "it takes away your chances of winning." Fox said he was somewhat disappointed at some colleges "going under the table to get athletes."

Although the Blues have been showing a potent offence against their competition early in the season, some of the players, including Fox, have been running into foul trouble. Fox suspects that part of the trouble can be attributed to the Blues' inexperience with the full court man to man defence.

"We're just out of practice with the man-to-man coverage, and we've been making mistakes."

Coach McManus attributes Fox's foul trouble to a back injury which has plagued the guard for most of this young season, but thinks Fox is regaining his true form:

"He was the fourth highest scorer in the league last year — he combines good offence, good defence and fine passing, an excellent all-round player."

In the future, Fox is thinking of applying to the Faculty of Education, but meanwhile he is concentrating on helping the Blues make this year's playoffs. "I hope we come up big," said Fox "I want to go out with a winning season."

Boxers Fighting Cutbacks

By DAVID HEALEY

Money may be a problem for U of T's boxing club but enthusiasm sure isn't. There are now approximately fifty interested students training for what may be a limited future in boxing at U of T.

North American fly-weight champion, Jason Lo says that the problem "is basically because of the Ontario University Athletic Association's (OUAA) cutbacks in spending".

"Our big problem is that we have no money for outside competition", says Lo. "We're forced to pay for the travelling expenses out of our own pockets and this is something we simply can't afford. There are no boxing clubs at other Canadian universities and this means the only competition we can get is from the United States. Again this costs a hell of a lot of money."

The proposed boxing meet in the U.S. next spring will depend solely on funds from the University. "We simply can't attend the meets without funds", says U of T boxing coach, Tony Canzano. "Our only hope of giving the guys some good practice and of keeping boxing going is to try and host a few meets ourselves. We're going to try and do this before the big NCBA (National College Boxing Association) meet next spring but nothing is too definite yet", says Canzano.

The lack of financial assistance is nothing new to boxing at U of T. "Because of a lack of funds we were only able to take four competitors to South Carolina last year," says Lo. "The year before that we were able to take eight. The pity of it all," says Lo, "is that we're a good team. Under Tony, last year, we had two guys in the finals and most of us did well in the semi-finals. That's not bad considering our small number."

Despite the darkening future, the enthusiasm looks bright. Canzano keeps all his boys on the move and won't let them rest for too long. "I want the rookies to get in shape and so, I keep them hopping," he said. "The important thing is that I want them to think and this means they've got to keep moving. I want them to learn to box, not just fight!" says Canzano. "Anybody can fight."

"But to box we need the financial help and this is what we're hoping for."

Moore Shines In US Meet

While many of U of T's wrestlers were competing in the Waterloo Invitational tournament last weekend, two of their finest fighters were carrying the banner of the Blue and White in the Great Lakes Invitational Tournament in Pennsylvania. Rob Moore and Ed Rector earned a place on the Ontario Provincial team which travelled south for the weekend tournament.

This tournament drew many of the best wrestlers from the Great Lakes area including fighters from Michigan, Pennsylvania and New York. Among this tough competition Moore turned in a standout performance, winning fourth place in the 145 pound class.

Moore fought eight fights to earn fourth spot, finishing ahead of 25 other competitors. His fourth place finish was the highest of any of the Ontario wrestlers.

Ed Rector had three fights in the tough 185 pound class and came home with a record of one win and two losses.

Both Moore and Rector will be rejoining the Varsity squad for the Ryerson Open this Saturday.

Hockey Update

Toronto, Ryerson and Western all climbed to the top of their leagues after the first couple of weeks of the hockey season. Last week, Western bombed Guelph 9-4 and Queen's 6-3 to edge past Laurier in the Western division.

Ryerson had a narrow 4-3 victory over Brock to open up a four point bulge in the central division.

The Blues meanwhile, continued to roll as they chalked up impressive wins of 12-4 over McMaster and 7-3 over York. These wins give the Blues a perfect 4-0 record and puts them four points ahead of their closest rival in the Eastern division.

Unidentified Toronto fencer shows his stuff.

Fencers Lunge Into Action

By BRAD PATTERSON

The Varsity men's fencing teams were at Kingston this past weekend to compete in the first all-weapons tournament of the season, the RMC Open.

Foilists Rick Arthur, Alan Steljes, and Len Subotich were very successful as a team, finishing second of 15 teams after an exciting final against Waterloo. This match went 8 of 9 possible bouts, the final score being 5-3 for Waterloo. After a bye in the first round, Toronto defeated U of Ottawa "B" 7-2 and CMR "B" 5-2. They lost to Waterloo 3-5 (third round), but came in the back door, winning 5-3 against CMR "A" to be in the finals.

The sabre team was not as successful. There were lengthy delays (over two hours) in this competition because some teams were also fencing foil. Toronto sabreurs Doug Crawford, Rod Hill, and Brad Patterson seemed to lose interest and competitive spirit in the long waiting periods, and despite having the ability to win, did not utilize it. Matches against Trent went 8-1 and against CMR "B" 5-1, but against Ottawa "B", U of T lost 3-5 and to CMR "A" 4-5. With more competition this year and under less aggravating circumstances, U of T should do well in the OUAA's in February.

The epee team pulled off a surprise by placing second of nine in the season's first tournament, which was also the first in epee for three of the four team members. Veteran Dave Hamer led newcomers Jim Scarrow, Bruno Scherzinger and Wolfgang Wehrfritz through five matches to the finals against RMC. In a very close and tense match, both teams finished with equal victories and defeats (the ninth and final bout ended in a double-defeat with both fencers losing). The winning team, chosen on indicators (points scored less points against); was RMC by only two points. The second place finish, however, was sufficient to give Toronto the Overall trophy.

The men's season has a break until the York and Carleton open Meets in January, and following those are the OUAA championship over three weekends. U of T has good talent this year, and the potential to win the OUAA overall as they did last year. This Saturday, Toronto is hosting the first women's OWIAA meet at the Benson Building. Come out to watch and support them.

Parrott backs off

By KATHY CANTY

The Minister of Colleges and Universities Harry Parrott, will not be coming to U of T on Dec. 22, a date he had previously set for making an appearance on this campus.

The first date was not acceptable to student leaders, said Parrott. "We'll be there when the plan for OSAP is finalized," he stated. "I'm not going to be on a public platform between now and January." After January, however, it will be impossible to make changes in the OSAP program.

Only a small percent turnout to these meetings, said Parrott. "People forget the pressure of being a minister and a member of parliament." He said that he was always extremely busy and scarcely had time for his home life. But "I'm not complaining," he added.

In a letter replying to a Varsity editorial (Try again Parrott, November 23) suggesting that December 22 was an inappropriate date for a visit, he said he wouldn't come. (See page four.)

In a subsequent telephone interview Parrott explained that he devotes a lot of time to the student press, and after reading the Varsity editorial felt his presence was not truly desired, "I'm not going to insult you by coming," he said.

Student council (SAC) president John Tuzyk explained that he asked Parrott to visit in January, since there would be no students on campus for the proposed December appearance. That suggestion, said Tuzyk was "almost instantaneously rejected."

According to Parrott all input will be in by the end of December, adjustments will be made in January and the program will go public on March 1. "By April applications will be available as usual," he said.

UFW urges boycott

By BARBARA ANDREW

Jessica Groves, Canadian Boycott Director for the United Farm Workers (UFW) in 1968 and 1973, urged U of T students to participate in an "informational picket line" in front of the Ontario Food Terminal yesterday.

Groves, speaking at the Medical Sciences Auditorium Monday night in the UFW campaign to boycott non-union grapes and lettuce, said the picket at the terminal, an agricultural depot for southern Ontario food brokers, would provide a "direct line" to California.

At the terminal, said Groves, produce is still identifiable with the grower. The brokers can see the pickets here in Toronto and inform the growers in California. Toronto UFW organizer Ned Dunphy termed the picket line "the one non-violent tool we have."

Dunphy said the support of the consumers in the major North American cities is tremendously important. It can put pressure on the growers to negotiate with the union, he said.

The meeting opened with the UFW film "Fighting for our Lives" which depicts the workers' plight during the strike of '73.

In 1975 the UFW convinced the government of California that there should be farm worker legislation, which went into effect in the fall of 1975, stated Groves. Workers could then vote by secret ballot to determine what union should represent them. After numerous setbacks, more elections and a lot of hard work, the farm workers won the right to negotiate working conditions with the growers.

The contract gives the farm worker a way to negotiate without going on strike, said Groves. Most growers were reluctant to negotiate but some have been more resistant than others. A group of recalcitrant growers, the "Delano Six", is the UFW's target. Groves said that in these cases economic pressure must be applied.

The UFW needs help from Canadian consumers to convince these six growers that it is now 1977 and that farm workers are human beings, says Groves.

Scar. paper in trouble

Editor suspended

By HEATHER HILL

The editor of the Scarborough College student newspaper, Balcony Square, was suspended Monday by Scarborough College Student Council (SCSC) Communications Commissioner Mike Griffin.

A letter dated November 28 delivered to Gail Misiunas on the paper's last production day of the term, notified the paper's second editor of the year of her immediate suspension from the paper. Griffin's decision will have to be ratified by the SCSC in mid-December, he said.

The letter cited Misiunas' retirement plans as the reason for the suspension. According to Griffin, Misiunas had "indicated you were considering retiring" at an SCSC media board meeting. However, he added the suspension was contingent on two other points.

Griffin stated there was "constant antagonism" between Misiunas and other commission members. He also said that Misiunas' "attempt to censor" a cover photo for the last issue of the paper was a "gross overstepping of the duties of your office."

The cover photo, taken by the paper's photo editor Craig Harris, who is also a deputy commissioner to the communications commission, portrayed "116 pretty girls with Merry Christmas overlaid on it."

Griffin defined the role of the editor as that of a "co-ordinator". He said there was no question of an overall responsibility for what appeared in the paper. Misiunas, who said she didn't want to "turn the Balcony Square into the Toke", stated that Harris delivered an ultimatum: if the cover photo wasn't printed, he wouldn't give the paper any more pictures.

Harris, who contended that the suspension resulted from Misiunas' "increasing centralization of authority," said he was "just attempting to inject a little life into a rapidly stagnating paper." He felt his photograph wasn't sexist: "It wasn't like the (Toronto) Sun with tits and ass" and added that "even pretty girls deserve to be looked at sometimes."

SCSC president John Shalagan said he trusted Griffin's judgement in the affair "wholeheartedly." While Harris was made deputy commissioner only last week, he stated that complaints about the paper had been received before, and that Misiunas had indicated at a media board meeting on November 17 that she would be resigning.

Misiunas herself said she didn't know why she was suspended. She admitted she had been talking of resignation but had made no official statement to the SCSC. She felt that the numerous criticisms the paper received at the media board meeting in question were unfair in light of the inexperience of the people working for the paper, including herself.

She said that she told the board "if they expected more from me than I could provide with my heavy schedule I would resign and a part-time student could take over." She stated she had "hardly any power" on the paper but felt she had the right to make suggestions.

Harris, however, said that "her complaints were completely unwarranted" and felt that Misiunas was hindering his ability to do his job. "When they started to bugger up the photos I got a little upset."

Misiunas, who left the paper during the production day when she received the letter, spoke of a rift between the photo department and the rest of the staff and of antagonism between herself and Harris. She has no grudge against the SCSC however, she said. "I would if I knew what was going on but I don't."

Griffin had no doubt that the council would ratify his decision. "It is very rare that Council has ever overturned an executive decision," he said. He added that he would consider resigning himself if the council didn't support his decision.

The last issue of Balcony Square of the fall term appears next Wednesday.

Committee crossfire heated but OSAP, visa hike ok

By LEON KING

Severe criticism against the Ontario government's gradual withdrawal of financial support from Ontario's universities was aired at the Academic Affairs Committee last Wednesday. Members of the committee, representatives of the Graduate Students Union (GSU) and John Rowan, representing four professional faculties were scathing in their remarks about the evolving policies of Harry Parrott, Minister of Colleges and Universities.

Professor George A. Reid, Chairman of the Subcommittee on Admissions and Awards, applauded the government's elimination of the mandatory $1,000 loan that had to precede a grant last year. He also urged that the government reconsider its proposals that adversely affect graduate, professional and part-time students.

P.S. Phillips, Director of Student Awards, stated that the recommendations of the subcommittee "would have to have an effect at all." Professor Michael Marrus was more pessimistic, feeling that "we have precious little chance of moving the government (gesturing) that much!"

Brian Bevan of the GSU condemned the government's principles, arguing that eligibility to graduate school be determined by the university, not through government economic discrimination. Bevan felt the government should "separate funding from the process of excluding students from the U of T."

While agreeing with most of the recommendations of the subcommittee, he pleaded for a stronger approach, advocating the simplification of one resolution to "rejecting the separation of graduate and undergraduate grant qualifications," and calling for a return to the old OSAP definition of independence.

John Rowan, president of the U of T Medical Society, felt that the government was making a professional career "less desirable by imposing a large amount of debt. As most professional students attend university for at least six years, they would be totally ineligible for OSAP in the last years of their programs."

Felix Salazar, part-time undergraduate representative, cautioned that the intent of the resolutions "should be to prod him (Parrott) and not antagonize him."

Professor Maurice Lister took the opposite view, saying that the resolutions were not strong enough. He recommended that the university give a show of strength, that Academic Affairs not be "chicken".

At this point a voice at the back (committee vice-president Michael Treacy) countered, "but we're arguing with a Parrott."

Regarding visa students, a rare show of solidarity between Treacy and the rest of the committee was displayed when he agreed to merge his resolution condemning the differential fee hikes with that of Philosophy Professor Tom Langan.

Langan's resolution begins with the words: "No policy in recent memory has so offended the collective conscience of the entire university community as the government-mandated 250 percent increase in fees for visa students." It argues that the increase discriminates against poorer foreign students, urges that the university pursue means to alleviate the situation, but concedes that until funds can be found, the university has "no practical alternative".

Treacy's resolution asked for a continued opposition to the fee increase and a fund of $200,000 (a doubling of last year's $100,000) to be set aside for visa students alone.

Langan expressed a wish to parachute the resolution onto Parrott's desk at the ministry.

Both the OSAP and visa student resolutions were passed, and the matter is now in the hands of U of T president John Evans, who is expected to meet with Parrott in early December.

UC eats union lettuce

By BARBARA ANDREW

Students at Sir Daniel Wilson Residence at University College are taking action in the boycott. In September a group informally asked the dietician to buy only union grapes and lettuce.

According to Angus Palmer, representative for Lowden House and vice-president of the Residence Joint Council, the dietician's initial response was not favorable. Some other residents feared their lettuce would be cut off altogether and became quite upset.

Following the failure of their informal approach, Palmer and UC student Peter Jacobs sponsored a motion in Residence Council that only union lettuce be used in the cafeteria. The motion passed and was presented to the dietician who now buys only union lettuce.

Palmer feels their action raised the level of interest in the problem and made people aware of human suffering. However, there was resentment on the part of some who felt the Council should not get involved in politics, he reported.

PC's to promote Parrott in press

By KATHY CANTY

The Progressive Conservative Party's attempt to improve the image of Harry Parrott, Minister of Colleges and Universities, on Ontario campuses has backfired.

In a memo dated November 8 from party headquarters, PC student leaders were urged to write letters to their campus newspapers supporting Parrott and his policies.

The memo stated that Parrott's new OSAP program provides "new benefits to students by enunciating Conservative ideals."

"The Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) had received a great deal of press, press which is in no way supportive of the Minister or of the majority of students. As Progressive Conservatives I am sure you too have felt that the minister has received unfair treatment. We cannot sit by and let the OFS receive all of the press. We must in fact counteract that amount of press," the memo said. The memo was signed by David Angus, youth director of the Ontario PC party.

In his enthusiasm, however, Angus made a statement which has recently sparked discussion: "It seems to me that Harry Parrott is the first honest, straightforward Minister the students have had to represent them at Queen's Park."

Among the former ministers of colleges and universities are Premier William Davis, minister of the environment George Kerr and Chairman of the Management Board James Auld.

Angus claims that he was not attacking the performances of former ministers in his memo. "It didn't even come to my mind until Sylvia Stead of the Globe and Mail mentioned it." What he meant, said Angus, was that Parrott is "going out and trying to do a job. He's honest and sincere and trying to make a better program."

"I wouldn't have used those words," said Parrott about Angus' statement. "Dave is trying to suggest that I'm fairly straightforward. No one's going to argue that." Angus "didn't see the impact of those words," said Parrott.

There is no watchdog over party workers to prevent these types of occurrences, said the minister. The party works through "free-minded individuals," he asserted. "We're not a doctrinaire-type of party."

When asked if he knew about Angus' plan for a letter campaign, he said "I was aware that he was working on it. I think it was a good idea. I don't see why a member of the government shouldn't have the support of his party."

Executive Director of the PC party Pat Kinsella said he encouraged Angus to undertake the letter campaign. He usually overrules Angus' plans in general, but he does not see all the details, explained Kinsella. He received a copy of Angus' letter after it was sent out. "I'm not upset about it," he said. "I'm not embarrassed about it or anything else."

OSAP discriminates students tell Parrott

By ANDREW MAHON

Minister of Colleges and Universities Harry Parrott was presented with a brief on behalf of professional students in Ontario yesterday at Queen's Park.

Students' Administrative Council (SAC) president John Tuzyk, U of T Medical Students' Society president John Rowan, Carol Beckman, president of Osgoode Hall's Legal and Literary Society, met with Parrott and his aides for an hour to discuss the brief outlining loan changes affecting students enrolled in professional programs.

Tuzyk said he didn't want to see professional schools become "the exclusive domain of the rich." According to Tuzyk, the three most contentious points of Parrott's proposals are: the eligibility period, the independent status and the grandfather clause.

The brief was prepared three months ago by professional schools all over the province.

The brief states that "proposed changes in OSAP are discriminatory and inequitable." It adds that "the Minister of Colleges and Universities is either unaware of or chooses to ignore the philosophical as well as the social and economic implications to society of the effect of the proposals on professional schools."

Parrott said after the meeting that he thought the brief was "strong."

"There are some very basic differences of opinion between us," observed Parrott. "However, I'm sure they (professional school representatives) feel that not being accepted is not the same as not being considered."

The brief recommends that "the minister reconsider the proposed abdication of the responsibility it has undertaken to provide meaningful and equitable assistance to all Ontario students seeking higher educational goals."

Former hooker wants an end to 'tired' laws

By GEORGE COOK

Margo St. James, a self-professed former "hooker" and founder of a San Francisco-based organization known as COYOTE (Call Off Your Old Tired Ethics) appeared before about 90 people at Innis Town Hall last Monday.

COYOTE, established in 1973, is lobbying for the decriminalization of prostitution in California. St. James was in Toronto to speak about the "Wages for Housework" campaign and to gather support for COYOTE's new Toronto affiliate BEAVER, (Better End All Vicious Erratic Repression).

St. James' presentation began with the showing of a film, "Hard Work," which she later described as "a portrait of the woman and her cause." It features St. James in conversation with members of the media, prostitutes, politicians and interested women.

"The film is addressed to women who have never thought about this issue before," she said.

Reaction to the movie was generally favorable. "I think every woman should see this film. It puts women in a very good light and that's what women need," Charlene Pellettier (Innis II) said afterwards.

Miriam Jones (Vic I) agreed. "I thought it was interesting and I agreed with what was said — it was an honest presentation in which a lot of basic issues were dealt with," she said.

After the film St. James fielded questions from the audience.

"In the 35 countries that have decriminalized prostitution, the average age of the prostitute has gone up," she said. St. James contended that the police, by arresting women for soliciting, have created conditions which force younger women to become prostitutes.

She said that decriminalization of prostitution would mean cheaper service for customers, more money for hookers, a decrease in the number of sexual assault crimes against women and the possible elimination of middle men.

In the parts of Europe where prostitution has been decriminalized "pimps are lucky to have one girl," she said.

St. James opposed "legalization" of prostitution, claiming that it involves the establishment of government-run brothels. "We want hookers to be free agents," she said.

Speaking about the relationship between "housewives and hookers" St. James told the audience: "Housewives are the unrecognized workers of society." Prostitutes are treated as criminals for catering to a market created by them. "It all has to do with the devaluation of women's time," she said.

Another account of the JFK assassination

By CONNIE FILLETTI

The assassination of U.S. President John F. Kennedy 14 years ago in Dallas, Texas, was the subject of a provocative three-hour slide presentation at Erindale College on November 22, the anniversary of Kennedy's death.

Tony Centa, a high school teacher and assassination devotee, delivered the presentation before a large, enthralled audience.

Centa has been accumulating material on the Kennedy slaying since 1964 after reading Josiah Thompson's Six Seconds in Dallas, one of the first books to posit the conspiracy theory. Until this time Centa said he was willing to believe the Warren Commission's conclusion that Lee Harvey Oswald acted alone in killing the president. The Warren Commission was set up by Kennedy's successor, Lyndon Johnson, to investigate the assassination.

In addition to owning hundreds of slides and over 700 books on the JFK case, Centa also has a Mannlicher-Carcano — the 6.5 Italian carbine allegedly used by Oswald — and a copy of the Abraham Zapruder film. Zapruder, a Dallas merchant, was filming the presidential motorcade when Kennedy received the fatal head shot.

The film depicts the massive damage done to the right posterior portion of Kennedy's skull, evidence important to the conspiracy theory. Only exit wounds cause such damage. Therefore, Warren Commission critics maintain, Kennedy had to be hit from a frontal position. However, the commission contends this was an entry wound. For it to admit otherwise would be tantamount to admitting the presence of a second gunman as Kennedy also received entry wounds from shots fired to the rear of the motorcade.

Other discrepancies surrounding President Kennedy's assassination Centa deals with in his presentation are:

- How could Commission Exhibit 399, the "magic bullet" do extensive damage to two individuals and remain in pristine condition? — the Warren Commission claims the bullet entered Kennedy's neck, exited at his throat, turned on angle and entered Texas Governor John Connally's right arm pit shattering a rib bone and then exited into his wristbone also shattering it before making a final exit into Connally's left thigh.

- Why was a German Mauser presented by Dallas police as the murder weapon for several hours after the assassination when Mannlicher-Carcano was clearly written on Oswald's carbine?

- Why was a sudden change made in the route of the presidential motorcade? The change led the Kennedy limousine onto Elm Street where all the shooting occurred.

- How could Oswald, a bad shot according to his military records, using a $12 mail order carbine known as "the humanitarian rifle," be so deadly accurate? — the Mannlicher-Carcano also was rusty, the telescopic sight was 12 inches off centre and it was fitted for a left handed person which Oswald wasn't.

- Why were the secret service agents, assigned to protect Kennedy, out drinking until 3 o'clock a.m. the morning of the assassination in direct contravention of the rules? — photographs show that their reactions during and following the assassination were sluggish and fatal in consequence.

- Why has the Texas Schoolbook Depository, the building from which Oswald allegedly fired, been locked and guarded since 1963?

- Why has testimony and other materials relating to the Kennedy assassination been locked up for the next 75 years under the executive order of President Johnson?

- Why were initial autopsy reports made at Bethesda Naval Hospital, where Kennedy's body was flown from Dallas, destroyed by the chief medical examiner?

During the question period following the presentation, Centa said he believes the Central Intelligence Agency, American oil men and "high ranking government officials" were involved in the conspiracy to assassinate the president.

Dear Mr. Editor:

I carefully read your editorial of November 23rd, and I would like to make the following comments:

You seem not to understand that the demands on the time of a Cabinet Minister are such that schedules do get "booked in" well in advance, and it has been impossible for me to attend U of T prior to the date that I proposed. Even the date I suggested means putting off an obligation in my Riding, as I had indicated to John Tuzyk, and I was prepared to do so until after the first of the year; and since the House hopefully will recess on December 21st I would use the time that I was normally in the House to attend U of T. Obviously, you feel that December 22nd is an inappropriate day, and on that basis I have decided to take your advice, and I quote from your last line:

"He shouldn't bother coming". Therefore I won't.

Yours truly,

Harry Parrott, D.D.S.

Editor

IT WON'T WORK

The letter we reproduce here is marked "Not for publication". We are publishing it because we feel students ought to know, in Harry Parrott's own words, why the Minister of Colleges and Universities has decided not to come to U of T.

Parrott says he's taking the advice of the Varsity in not coming to U of T. While we like to think that provincial ministers take our advice seriously the minister has in this case deliberately distorted our position.

We never told Parrott not to come to U of T. What we said was that coming to U of T when students have left the campus is as good as not coming at all. Consequently, if December 22 is the only day Parrott can spare he might as well not come at all.

Parrott says we don't understand how busy he is. Poor man! Here's Ontario's (and Canada's) largest university and Parrott doesn't have time to visit except when everybody's away.

We have our own explanation of why Parrott is not coming to U of T: he's scared of students. He has persistently demonstrated that he doesn't care about student interests and he's aware that this hasn't made him popular with students. However, it's not good public relations to openly declare that what students think and say has no bearing on the Minister's final decision on the student aid program.

So Parrott tried to pull a fast one. He must have figured that whether his proposal was accepted or not he couldn't lose: if SAC had been stupid enough to let him come on the 22nd he would have faced an empty auditorium. He would have gone away saying that students are satisfied with the proposed changes in the student aid scheme. The media for its part would have repeated the old line that students are apathetic.

Parrott was told not to bother. So now he's trying to win sympathy by saying that we don't appreciate how limited his time is.

If, as is the case, he was told not to come, he could say that he wanted to but students didn't want him to.

The fact is Parrott has been booed and jeered on every campus he's visited so far. When he visited Seneca College (not the most accessible spot in Toronto) he was met by 700 angry students. No wonder! His proposed student aid scheme puts the screws on students at a time when they are already suffering from the effects of the current economic crisis.

Parrott's proposed aid scheme will become law after next January. It will decide which students will afford to go to university for the next 5 years. Parrott's compulsive avoidance of students means that he's already decided who's going and who isn't.

The encouraging thing is that Parrott's scared. If we scare him some more he's likely to change his mind.

PAC tour

Every day we hear more about repression in Azania, despite claims of democratization by the white racist regime. Newspapers and organizations are banned, unarmed black demonstrators shot down, hundreds, like the leaders of the Pan Africanist Congress (PAC), are arrested and blacks, like Steve Biko are murdered in prison.

The fascist Vorster regime pushes "separate development" as a solution to the "racial" problems. Under this apartheid system, the 4.5 million whites keep over 85 percent of the land, all of it stolen from the African people, while the 22 million Africans have only 12.5 percent of the land, most of it totally unproductive. No wonder one African child dies every minute from disease and starvation while the white colonial settlers enjoy the highest standard of living in the world!

The Azanian people have a long history of hard struggle. For over 50 years they struggled peacefully for their liberation. But the increasing oppression and exploitation, including massacres like that of over 1,000 people in Soweto last year, have shown the people that only armed struggle will guarantee the final victory.

The main enemy is not only the Vorster regime, but the imperialist powers which prop it up. The United States backs the regime to the hilt with arms and support for a "peaceful transition to majority rule", in order to keep its hands on Azania's gold and diamonds. The other power, the Soviet Union, is operating under a "socialist" mask and is even more devious. Having already invaded and still occupying Angola, it now splits the liberation forces in southern Africa to try and sneak in and replace the USA as Africa's new colonial master. But as PAC has said many times, the Azanian people will not stand for either American or Soviet imperialism.

Canadian imperialism is also in on the plunder. With the full backing of the government, Canadian banks and corporations, like Alcan or Massey-Ferguson, make millions from the sweat of the black workers who are paid a few dollars a day.

These same Canadian monopolies exploit our labour, and use national oppression and racism to divide the people. Every blow we strike against the capitalists helps the Azanian people, and their resistance weakens our main enemy too. That is why it is important for us to wipe out one more imperialist class from this world by overthrowing the Canadian capitalists and building a socialist Canada.

Students play a major role in the Azanian struggle. African students are courageously fighting, often with just sticks and stones, against the repressive apartheid system. Over 600,000 have resisted government orders and continue their boycott of the colonial schools. Many also have joined the guerrilla movement in the battle for their people's liberation.

Here in Canada, students too have actively opposed the Azanian fascists. At Scarborough College, student protest prevented a group of white Azanian officials from visiting the campus. Students at many schools continue to demand that the respective administrations withdraw all investments in companies with operations in Azania.

We must continue to give concrete support to the Azanian struggle. This is why the Canadian Communist League (Marxist-Leninist) is organizing a Canada-wide tour of PAC representatives, to build support and raise funds for their struggle. PAC aims to forge a united front of all liberation forces and of all the peoples, regardless of race, who support the black African liberation movement.

Come out and hear the PAC liberation fighters. A student from Soweto and the PAC representative for Asia and Australia will be speaking Friday, December 1, 12 noon at the International Student Centre, 33 St. George St., and Saturday, December 3, 7:30 p.m. at Ontario College of Education, Bloor at Spadina. Monetary support is also very important; one truck to carry supplies, alone costs over $29,000. Please send your contributions to the Azanian Peoples' Support Committee, P.O. 222, Station E, Montreal.

No multisyllabicity

I am a concerned student, eager to understand the current political situation on this campus, and I rely heavily upon the Varsity to accomplish this task. In order to aid this, would you please stop quoting people who use large and difficult to understand words. Such an act would certainly discourage their indiscriminate use, and aid comprehension by the average student.

I refer in particular to the front page article of Nov. 23 "Unrestrained fee hikes ok", by Kathy Canty, in which John Tuzyk was quoted as using the word "exacerbate". A survey held in my class, IND ENG IV, revealed that only one person knew what this word meant. Most thought it pertained to some form of masturbation.

If you insist upon using big words, would you please include a simple explanation of the term used within a footnote. Such an addition would greatly increase our comprehension of your rag, and would be a positive step on your part on behalf of student literacy.

Thank you for your effort.

Freedom of speech does not mean welcoming racists

The representatives of the South African University of Stellenbosch have long since left the U of T, but the repercussions of their visit continue. Notice of motion on the issues raised by their reception has been placed before the Governing Council. In its next meetings the Council will debate whether or not it should refuse to officially receive representatives of any university that practices racial discrimination. Since this question is bound to establish some important precedents, it is imperative that there be a public review of the arguments for and against such a policy.

A wide spectrum of campus councils and organizations condemned the official reception of the Stellenbosch representatives. It was our charge that the University of Stellenbosch was not only an active supporter, but even worse, an active architect of the system of apartheid. The evidence was bountiful: the faculty of Stellenbosch provided the ruling party of South Africa, the National Party, with the men who formulated the policy of apartheid; three of the four prime ministers of the same National Party came from Stellenbosch; and the present National Party prime minister, John Vorster, is the chancellor of the University of Stellenbosch.

Even more disturbing was the knowledge of how the U of T meeting would be used. It is no secret that the South African government and the white controlled news media use meetings between South African representatives and prominent Westerners as propaganda material. The government and news media tell the South African populace that, regardless of official condemnations, the people of North America and Western Europe support apartheid. In addition, since the University of Stellenbosch actively participates in apartheid education, any information it acquired to aid its operation was information that furthered apartheid education.

It should be noted that the U of T administration has never denied or refuted these charges. Instead it maintained, albeit reluctantly, that while all of these allegations may be true, there was another, overriding consideration. The official meeting with the Stellenbosch representatives could not be cancelled, Simcoe Hall claimed, because to do so "would be contrary to the basic principle of intellectual openness of universities and would remove all opportunity to learn and to influence." (October 5th statement of President John Evans) This argument has been the only one made in defense of the official reception of the Stellenbosch representatives.

In the Governing Council meeting where the debate over the Stellenbosch visit began, the supporters of the university administration expanded upon this argument. They claimed that to deny an official reception to the University of Stellenbosch was tantamount to restricting freedom of speech, however distasteful their practices and policies. Secondly, they contended that a decision to deny official recognition to a university because of its policies would be detrimental to the principle of academic freedom. It would rule out the possibility of academic exchanges between faculty and students of the U of T and the university in question. It was argued that the establishment of a precedent in the case of the University of Stellenbosch would create a situation where U of T faculty and students would be unable to do research or study in the People's Republic of China, and correspondingly, where the U of T would be unable to accept Chinese students or faculty for similar purposes.

Such positions reveal a profound lack of knowledge of the traditions of democratic rights and freedoms within the university. The line of reasoning of the visit's defenders is fraught with errors of fact and logic.

The fundamental error lies in the endeavor to merge the three separate questions of freedom of speech, academic freedom, and the power of the university to officially recognize and receive external representatives of other universities and organizations. Freedom of speech pertains to the right of any individual or group within the university community to freely and openly express his or her opinion, whatever it may be. Academic freedom pertains to the right of any student or faculty member to involve themselves in study, research, or teaching of their own choice. Neither of these freedoms is tied to the power of the university to recognize and receive representatives of other bodies; this is a matter not of being the guarantor of free expression of opinion, but a question of endorsing, if only implicitly, a particular opinion.

The distinction between these three functions of the university rests upon the most elementary distinction in democratic theory and practice. A government cannot claim to be fully democratic unless it protects the rights of its citizens to free expression. But these rights pose a dilemma: some opinions expressed are anti-democratic opinions. The only method of resolving such a dilemma is for the government to maintain free expression of all opinions while officially distancing itself from those opinions that undermine democratic rule. It does not therefore recognize and receive individuals or groups that deny basic human rights, i.e., individuals or groups that practice racism.

By merging these three functions into one, those who adopt the position of the university administration attempt to defend the Stellenbosch visit as consistent with the principles of free speech and academic freedom. The denial of official recognition and reception to the representatives becomes equivalent to the denial of the right to voice one's opinion. It follows quite logically that those who would have had the U of T turn away the Stellenbosch representatives were guilty of a double standard. We sought freedom for those who agreed with us, the allegation went, but were not willing to extend it to those who held opinions we considered obnoxious.

Nothing could be further from the truth. The supporters of the Stellenbosch visit have distorted our position. We are in full support of the principles of freedom of speech and academic freedom; we do not suggest that freedom of speech be restricted in any way or that political judgements be imposed upon academic ventures. Those freedoms are the hard-won freedoms of progressive individuals and groups within the university and will not be surrendered.

We suggest that the U of T exercise its proper responsibility in regard to the recognition and reception of external representatives. Representatives from universities that have adopted policies contrary to basic human rights should not be welcome on our campus. To meet with and offer them information is to provide them with a vote of confidence in their present operations, not to mention the means of "improving" a discriminatory educational system. This vote of confidence is also an insult to and a transgression against faculty and students of this university community who would themselves be denied entrance to the University of Stellenbosch.

The responsibility for such a vote of confidence in the activities of the University of Stellenbosch cannot be borne by the principles of freedom of speech and academic freedom. No clever rhetorical flourishes will change this fact. Moreover, if the U of T persists in using such a defense in such affairs it will have assumed an additional responsibility — the damage done to the principles of freedom of speech and academic freedom in falsely calling upon them to cover U of T complicity with apartheid.

Non-smoker suffers

My throat is parched. My eyes feel gritty and burned. Lips cracked, blistering. My concentration seems feeble. I sense, more than see, the blue veil which envelops my scorched surroundings.

The problem is not that I'm stranded upon the merciless Sun's Anvil, mocked by the existential emptiness of my canteen. I'm sitting in a so-called "no smoking" section of Roberts Library. Smokers, there are rooms designated as "Smoking Rooms" solely for you to pursue your probably unsatisfying, although still legal, addiction. I understand you may not like these rooms, because after all, they reek of stale nicotine.

Do I make myself perfectly clear?

Perspectives: "language requirement" - ici on en parle

Pour les étudiants dans la Faculté des Arts et des Sciences qui suivent des programmes d'études canadiennes, "il est absolument essentiel de pouvoir parler le français," a dit M. David Smith, chairman du Département de Français, dans un interview récent.

Il parlait du rapport du Task Force on Canadian Studies, qui a suggéré que le français du grade 13 d'école secondaire soit condition requise pour l'admission à l'Université par 1982. Il a affirmé que l'échange d'idées entre les canadiens-français et les canadiens-anglais est d'importance énorme dans tels programmes d'étude. "Du moment qu'on est spécialiste de quelque chose canadien, on devrait pouvoir s'entre-communiquer les uns les autres."

Mais en dehors des études canadiennes, Smith a expliqué qu'il oppose la suggestion que tout étudiant entrant à la faculté devrait avoir complété un cours de français au treizième niveau. Il a parlé des étudiants des minorités italiennes et chinoises à Toronto. A son avis, il serait injuste de leur forcer à devenir trilingue.

Smith a attaqué l'obsession du

Task Force avec le français en disant que leur rapport lui a semblé "un peu en dehors des termes dans lesquels ils ont dû opérer." Il voyait un désir de la part des membres du Task Force de "jouer leur petit rôle dans le processus" politique du Canada à présent. Il a révélé qu'on "n'a jamais demandé au département de discuter les recommandations," sauf un interview. Il a raconté qu'à ce temps-là ils les a accusés de pratiquer "naked politics," auquel un des membres, John Bassett, a répondu qu'il n'avait "aucune objection à la politique, et aucune objection à la nudité." Selon Smith, les discussions sur les règlements d'entrée à la faculté devront être tenues par la faculté elle-même.

Smith a suggéré alors la résurrection du "language requirement" il y a des années, qui exige une compétence dans une langue autre que l'anglais, soit le français, l'italien, ou le grec. "Ce que je propose serait beaucoup plus acceptable" parce qu'il donnera un choix à l'étudiant. Cependant il a reconnu que "la différence pratique est très peu" car environ 85-90% choisissent le français.

Mais le professeur Raymond Brazeau, chef du département français à Trinity College, n'a pas partagé ces sentiments. "Il faut être pratique... une langue seconde est un avantage évident, et dans le contexte canadien c'est le français." Il a aussi mentionné que dans un pays ayant deux langues officielles, toute décision au sujet du statut de ces langues ne peut pas éviter la politique. "Il faut accepter le mal avec le bien."

Paul Perron, représentant du département à Victoria, a ajouté que les propositions du Task Force lui semblaient "tout à fait raisonnables." Quoiqu'il se soit modéré en remarquant qu'il n'était pas au courant des discussions du rapport, il a dit que "vue l'histoire particulière du Canada, vues les 'deux nations', vues les problèmes économiques maintenant, ça ne peut pas faire du mal."

Un vote fort négatif a été enregistré par le chef du département à U.C., John Walker. "Je n'aime pas qu'on exige les choses... On doit encourager les étudiants à apprendre le français, mais je suis contre la force. Ce n'est pas par la force qu'on va rendre ce pays bilingue."

La plupart des professeurs voyaient le rapport comme commencement d'une tendance générale: "Les recommandations reviendront à un curriculum plus rigide," a dit Brazeau. L'anglais, une deuxième langue, les maths et les sciences ont été les "éléments essentiels" favorisés pour une "bonne" éducation. Smith a dit "bonne" éducation. Smith dit qu'il faut se débarrasser du "système cafeteria" qui existe à présent dans les écoles secondaires. En critiquant les plans du gouvernement provincial de faire adopter un nouveau curriculum obligatoire dans ces écoles, y compris le français, la secrétaire d'étudiants de français, Marianne O'Neill-Karch, a déclaré que l'université n'a pas le temps d'attendre Queen's Park. "On ne peut pas se fier au gouvernement." Selon la plupart, il serait aussi impossible — "un cauchemar administratif" — de donner des exemptions à certains étudiants des maths et des sciences.

Smith a conclu en espérant que la comité acceptera la proposition d'une exigence d'une deuxième langue et non du français seul. Autrement il prévoit qu'une exigence de français "va tuer les petits départements (d'allemand, etc.) aux lycées" et aussi à l'université. "Il ne faut pas chercher à faire des ennemis." Ni lui ni les autres n'ont voulu essayer de prédire la décision au sujet de l'enseignement de français que déclarera le Academic Affairs Committee en janvier.

Brazeau a offert une différente explication de la situation entière. Vue l'inscription descendante aux universités ontariennes, il voyait la suggestion d'une exigence de français comme un effort par l'université de maintenir ses "standards très élevés," pour pouvoir continuer à choisir les meilleurs étudiants de la province, à la charge des universités plus petites. Selon lui, la politique réelle contenue dans le rapport n'est pas celle d'Ottawa-Québec mais d'université contre université. "Je suis en faveur des recommandations telles qu'elles sont, (mais) je serais d'accord si elles seront acceptées d'une façon modifiée."

Dear Student:

While it may be impossible to report to you all of the highlights of SAC activity in the first term and to preview all of the plans for next term, I am taking this opportunity nonetheless to report on the state of SAC at this point in time. I should add that this message takes on added significance given your status as a member of SAC as an incorporated body as of May 5th, 1977.

Earlier this year, SAC identified student aid and unemployment as two issues of pressing concern to students. Working in co-ordination with other students through U of T's membership in the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) and the National Union of Students (NUS), we have worked towards a more effective student aid plan and for government action with respect to the problem of unemployment; in particular student unemployment.

We have attempted to influence provincial government policy with respect to student aid policy through private and public meetings with the Minister of Colleges and Universities, meetings with M.P.P.'s of all parties, briefs to the government, extensive media contact and by seeking support from other groups in the province (high school students, Boards of Education, etc.). At all times, our goal has been a student aid scheme which promotes the elimination of financial barriers to post-secondary education. While important concessions have been gained (elimination of arbitrary summer savings, grant as a first form of assistance), SAC intends to press for further changes to ensure that any new student aid plan meets the test of improving accessibility to post-secondary education. If we are to be successful in our objectives, student support is essential. Your participation is invited through the U of T Student Aid Committee.

With respect to unemployment, SAC participated in the NUS card-campaign to draw the federal government's attention to the serious problem of student unemployment, both summer and graduate, and student policy proposals in this area. Recently, SAC External Commissioner, John Doherty, and myself had the opportunity of discussing the card campaign personally with the Prime Minister. We also have had discussions with the Prime Minister's Youth Advisor on the subject. Our goals at this time include expanded summer job creation programs at both the federal and provincial level, and direct job creation for graduating students in areas where their skills can be utilized. In co-operation with the GSU, SAC is sponsoring a series of panel discussions on unemployment to which the three federal party leaders have been invited. Again, part of our strategy has been to work with other groups affected by unemployment, a tangible example of which was the Ontario Federation of Labour's invitation to have student participation in the OFL's meeting with the Ontario Cabinet. In the new term, we will be attempting to provide a means for illustrating student support for government action at both levels in this field.

The quality of our education remains of foremost importance to SAC as well. So far this year, this commitment has demonstrated itself with regard to the level of library services, the Erindale "New" New Program and curriculum changes in Forestry, to name but a few examples.

The nature of the campus environment and campus facilities has also been highlighted as SAC continues to press the administration to implement the first phase of the Campus as Campus Centre project. The first phase involves the closing of Willcocks Street and the development of badly needed lounge and recreational space in the Sid Smith area. The results of our efforts in this area will come to the fore in January.

SAC's concern with the cost and quality of campus services does not end with the Campus as Campus Centre project. We have attempted this year to offer a high quality program of our own services which would appeal to various tastes, and I think the record speaks for itself in terms of success. The film series averaged an attendance rate of over 1,000 people weekly at the three locations, over 4,000 U of T undergraduates attended our Con Hall concert series in the first term, an average of 200 people attended the folk series weekly at its two locations, and the weekly pub has averaged 300 patrons. The Writers-in-Residence Conference attracted capacity crowds, and the Riding Stables and Sexual Education Centre have also seen increased usage. For the first time in three years, SAC Student Directories are available in the first term. And of course, this term ends with the December 9th Roam-Around.

Increased attendance was perhaps due in some small measure to improved promotion techniques. This year, SAC introduced the Campus Week poster, and the Sid Smith and Dentistry Info Desks. The Scarborough SAC Desk and Erindale Info Desk have provided information and tickets for SAC events on the suburban campuses. SAC also introduced the SAC Newsletter and a revised format for the SAC Page, and has made better use of suburban radio facilities.

As we look forward to January, Ski-days and Winter Carnival loom large. As well, we have initiated plans to re-open Radio Varsity on an interim basis, with a small budget of under three hundred dollars. Depending on student reaction, and on the degree of student involvement, next year's SAC may decide to re-open the station on a more permanent basis.

Students are often portrayed in the media as being selfish and motivated purely by self-interest. Two recent SAC-organized activities offered an effective rebuttal to this charge. The Preview Day program matched over 1,000 high school students with university students who donated their time to give prospective U of T students an insight into the university. The most recent Blood Donor Clinic was the most successful ever; over 1,800 pints of blood were received.

Unfortunately, all of these programs and projects cost money, and inflationary pressures have resulted in increased costs every year. SAC this year is projected to spend no more than last year's council, arresting a trend of previous annual increases in expenditures of 15% since 1973. We have been able to do this by increased revenues from various sources (handbook advertising, the sale of student directories, etc.) and trimming expenditures where appropriate. In particular, we have closely monitored spending on administrative and office expenses. I am pleased to report that this year, those areas will receive only 22% of the SAC budget, as compared to over 30% at other university student councils.

However, despite our success this year in arresting growth in expenditures, SAC nonetheless remains in an overall operating deficit situation. In light of this fact, this year's Board of Directors has authorized the holding of a referendum for the purpose of increasing the SAC fee, which has remained unchanged from its 1968 level of $12.

While the Board took the step reluctantly (raising taxes is never popular) it did so mindful of SAC's future needs and responsibilities to its members. The ultimate decision, however, rests with you.

In closing, I would like to reiterate the message contained in the SAC Handbook, the letter to first year students, and my letter in the first Varsity of the year: if you have suggestions to offer, criticisms to make, or questions to ask, drop in. Not only are we receptive to what you have to say, but as well we have free coffee (for the moment, anyway), 20¢ pop (sorry for the increase); a 5¢ xerox (no charges anticipated here) and a relaxing lounge (no admission charge yet).

Yours sincerely,

John Tuzyk,
President, SAC

Single parents unite to air common complaints

By MIKE MOYLAN

An informal group now exists on campus to aid and abet student single parents at U of T.

Spokeswoman Janice O'Connor said the main objectives of the Association for Single Student Parents (ASSP), located at Innis College are to create a central information centre, to pressure the government on the financial needs of single student parents, to advise the university of the need for drop-in day-care facilities and to establish a consciousness raising group for members.

Theo Dawson, ASSP organizer, feels their group will allow single parents to air their problems and support one another. She said that some of the problems include loneliness and difficulties in obtaining student grants, as well as readjusting to university life.

These problems can't always be solved by social agencies, said

Dawson, but only through the help of other people. She feels their group will allow members to turn to each other for support and "pull themselves above their problems." Dawson points out that single student parents would benefit because they need time for themselves, and shouldn't think of the ASSP as just another chore taking up their time.

O'Connor intends to submit a brief to Harry Parrott, Minister of Colleges and Universities, outlining the association's aims. She is also working on getting funding, but has been unsuccessful so far. She has requested a list of all the single student parents at U of T from the Ontario Bursary Program in order to contact them and ascertain their needs and interests. This information would be listed in the brief to Parrott she said.

The Ontario Student Awards Program (OSAP) is unfair to single student parents according to O'Connor. While OSAP makes funds available to full-time student parents, less consideration is given to the single parent student in the loan portion of OSAP. She mentioned that student parents often can't get a job immediately after graduation yet still must start paying back their loans six months after ending full-time study. She wants single student parents to pressure the government to change this practice.

Dawson criticized OSAP for the proposal to make loans available to students for four consecutive years only. She pointed out that in order to be eligible a student would need to take five courses a year over four years. The policy might be beneficial for the "average" student, she said, but not for single parent students. Dawson added that OSAP's proposal has already been approved by the U of T.

O'Connor hopes the ASSP will provide a solution to some of these problems. One of her main goals is to pressure the university into providing a drop-in day-care centre for single parents to pick up their children any time during the day or visit them between classes. "You've got to spend time with your children because they're human too, and need attention," she stated.

O'Connor also insisted that ASSP wants male members too. She added: "We don't want to form a social group for single people to meet partners. We want to give psychological support and teach survival."

ZANU speaks out

By GEORGE COOK and BRENDA MILLER

"We refuse to have our war described as a racial one. It's a war against a system that's been exploiting us for over a hundred years," A. M. Chidoda, the representative of the Zimbabwe African National Union (ZANU) said last Sunday.

Speaking to members of the Ontario Region of the Canadian University Press (ORCUP) at a conference held at Brock University last weekend, Chidoda said that ZANU was formed in 1963 after numerous attempts at peaceful social change by other political organizations had failed.

"We sought to solve the problems through peaceful means but were met by progressive violence from the illegal, racist Smith regime. To achieve national liberation we chose armed struggle as our principle method," Chidoda told the conference.

"We called upon the people to take up guns to meet violence with violence," he added.

Chidoda said the war in Rhodesia has been misrepresented by the commercial press. "They like to write what is sensational and they end up poisoning a lot of people's minds," he stated.

"It's the small minority of white

Daycare at U of T -- the product of a long fight

By CHRIS STADDON

A parent's handbook put out by the Margaret Fletcher Day Care Centre says that the centre was opened in 1974 to meet the needs of staff and students at U of T. It does not mention that the centre is, as Supervisor Mercedes Chacin de Fuchs says, "the product of a long fight" between the Campus Cooperative Community Day Care Centre and the Governing Council of U of T. The battle culminated in a lengthy occupation of an old meteorological clubhouse on Devonshire.

U of T turned its sights to an adjacent property — an old coach house at 100 Devonshire Place. Following a year of renovations the Margaret Fletcher Day Care Centre opened its doors. The centre was named after a prominent Canadian educator who had been associated with the Institute of Child Study since 1927.

The centre is administered by a board of directors composed of four parents and three day-care liaison officers appointed by the president of U of T. Six professionally trained full-time staff, carry out the program under the direction of the supervisor. The centre is occasionally visited by student teachers from child care programs at local community colleges and the Institute of Child Study.

The centre cares for 48 children between the ages of two and five — they are all children of university staff and students. It is, as de Fuchs says, an "international community" with different nationalities represented among the children and staff. De Fuchs also views the services provided by the centre as "primary prevention daycare" — a means of removing some of the pressures of child care borne by the nuclear family.

"We try to make it a kind of support system for the family," she explained. "Daycare should be complementary to the family, not try to replace it," she added.

The monthly fees of $200-a-child (increased from $145 in 1974) are expensive by the standards of most students but they are competitive with those charged by other Metro daycare centres. Some parents pay the entire fee themselves; others receive subsidies from the municipality according to a sliding scale of payments based on the income of the parents and their expenses.

De Fuchs would like to see free universal daycare and is critical of the system of evaluating income which does not permit subsidy applicants to hold savings in the bank. What it boils down to, de Fuchs says, is that "the problems of working parents don't really concern politicians" and that "people don't want to know about the effects of cutbacks." Admitting that attitudes towards daycare are slowly changing she asked: "If you don't have a choice, what can you do? What it amounts to is that the government doesn't want to see women work."

Cont'd from p.7

Europeans who have political and economic power." (Of Rhodesia's 7,200,000 people about 180,000 are white.)

Asked whether any whites are helping ZANU, Chidoda replied: "We have white farmers who support the struggle because they understand it. They give us food and shelter."

Chidoda said ZANU sees the Anglo-American plan "as evil, sly and absolutely intended" to undermine the struggle of the Zimbabwean masses.

He added that Britain's designate commissioner Lord Carver, who, under the Anglo-American plan, would be in charge of military and administrative affairs during the six-month transition period to majority rule, "is a representative of the colonial power in Britain."

"ZANU is supposed to be a passive observer during the transition period while Lord Carver consolidates his own power," he said.

"We won't let Britain form our army on our behalf," he said.

ZANU is opposed to UN peacekeeping forces according to Chidoda. "If they come on behalf of Britain it is unacceptable."

ZANU also rejects the principle of "one man one vote" proposed by Ian Smith. "We are no longer at the stage of struggling just for reforms.

Have our people died for a vote? It is now a question of fighting to change the system," Chidoda said.

"It is not up to someone in Britain or the U.S. to determine our elections. We know the activities of these countries elsewhere. The U.S. aids and abets military coups if they don't like the course of elections," he said.

ZANU, Chidoda continued, is not in need of recruits for its armed wing. "In fact we are short of facilities in which to train our freedom fighters. The majority are high school students, 18, 19 and 20 years old."

"We need supplies — clothing, medical kits and medicine, blankets, shoes, picks, things like that," he said.

This week's theme is madness. On your right an essay by Laszlo Toth, the somewhat outspoken critic who knocked the arm off the Pieta. Also, a look at Hitler plus an essay on madness and art can be found on pages 10 and 11.

A review of The Sea. No, not the rolling waves but a play by Edward Bond. Turn to page 14.

Pianist Ivanfai Gondos made a few enemies during Sunday's Grey Cup. No he didn't ride a horse through Massey Hall, but he did something as bad. Turn to page 17 and find out exactly what.

A fit of insanity against sanity or what did you do in the dialectic, daddy?

I'd like to see signs erected at the borders of this country reading "nuts wanted." We have all the sanity we need.

Or maybe I'd just like to see the terms "sanity" and "insanity" used in more realistic contexts.

You may wonder why I should have to defend madness, when there are so many people in white coats doing the job. Indeed, it is in their interest — in the desire to stay employed — to propagate madness. We share the same interest, at least on the surface.

From that point on, this paranoid writer and the folks in white part company. I don't like their job, and fear them deeply. A cell of the organism will explain his fears.

He lies in the societal organism, often comfortable, sometimes very discontented inside the behemoth. It's a safe behemoth, thanks to the antibodies in blue, and these white-coated corpuscles that remove the portions of the body that threaten the well-being of the whole. The blue-coated antibodies have lately been showing signs that they can instruct the white-coats to eliminate cells that they have decided are dangerous. Who says what's healthy for the organism, this paranoid cell wonders.

Lately, there have been signs that the criterion for "health" in a cell is conformity. These signs may be read in the letters column of the Toronto Sun, for instance.

Let me elucidate, in the context of "lifestyle". Lifestyle is a relatively recent term, and one that could only be coined in an age sufficiently self-conscious to govern its behaviour in aesthetic rather than ethical terms. The blindly conservative element referred to above (the letter writers) does not want to see its lifestyle disturbed. It is not listening to the symptoms of its own disease.

I place the letter writers of the sort mentioned above in the same category with those enforcement agencies that decide what is or isn't above the law for themselves. This explains why "antibodies" would be an appropriate terminology for those anti-humanistic elements devoted to the preservation of a lifestyle to the exclusion of any critique of its values.

There may seem to be a marxist bias to this; not so. In political discussions, I have observed that at least some card-carrying, lobbying marxists — that's what they call themselves — will draw their own arbitrary line between sanity and insanity. Only in the marxist-leninist scheme of things their asylum would be filled with fascists, as they choose to define the term.

Power is required to be able to enforce this beautifully arbitrary line between the blessed and the damned (sane and insane). But please, don't assume that I'm only concerned with getting people to asylums, and the, by now, well-known atrocities of certain authoritarian regimes. There is great power in the majority opinion at a cocktail party, or on a football team; ostracism is a significant act of violence in its own right.

In our society, the antibodies have a majority of support; make no mistake, Trudeau knows the grassroots when he says that sometimes, law enforcement must follow the ethic that the ends justifies the means. People don't care about politics so far as their televisions still carry the NHL, and don't get stolen. Lifestyle.

But something dialectical happens between the groups that either affirm or reject social values. The group rebelling serves to reinforce the conservatives, by being so (supposedly) antisocial; the rebels find reinforcement in the smug, and (as they see it) uncritical disdain of the establishment. While there is something potentially destructive going on, notice how well they fuel each other; witness the support that each side gives the other in the conflict of supposed opposites. Both are aspects of a "lifestyle" society, even when serious ethical considerations seem to be the overriding consideration.

So I can relax a bit in my paranoia: for while I may be a threat to my mother's values, she needs me to confirm that hers are correct.

Getting back to this idea of power and the ability to draw the line, there is comfort, even in the state-supported asylum for lunatics, dissidents and other nasties. Denial of the self in favour of the powers of reason has failed to deliver the promised goods. If part of the social contract involves a sacrifice of a part of the self, that self will still find its way out into the open. Earthen dams only last so long, and even concrete is subject to erosion.

What began as an appeal for madness really becomes a request that the words "sanity" and "insanity" be dumped from our vocabularies. The conviction that one knows what is sane and insane is not far from the readiness to say "he's mad" or "she's dangerously insane". Such a society produces a fear of self-expression, just because one knows the way of the world. And how, therefore, is it surprising in a society that reinforces conformity of expression (a Skinnerian learning process that goes on without the direct control of those who might wish it to go on), that the self bursts free in such outwardly respectable forms as Berkowitzes and Calleys? They were such good boys.

One doesn't cut one's head off over a headache; the headache is, however, the body's message to the brain that something was done wrongly, like the banging of the head against hard objects, or the consumption of alcohol. The mind listens to such messages in some cases. Is society listening to the symptoms of its disease at all, or applying wholesale amputation?

Slight aberrations from "health" happen in a similar context, representing parts of an organism, and not mere individuals. Punk rock may be seen as such a case.

It's hard to conceive of a more impoverished art form than New Wave music. It is deliberately so, hating itself, flagellating itself and listener in the process of expressing alienation. This near-total alienation is best expressed in an appropriate form. Simplistic and anti-conscious music is suitable, in a will to negate consciousness, to give the finger to the screwed-up lifestyles that claim to be things that they are not. At least it's honest, following its avowed intention.

I prefer the music of Mozart not because it is safer politically, but because I think it sounds better. For those needing a political statement, even an anti-political statement, in their choice of music — an integral part, after all, of a lifestyle — Mozart is not recommended.

Life goes on, and so does expression. The self ultimately gets expressed, no matter how crazy it is deemed to be; and the various dialectics associated also work their way through to resolution, no matter how disgusting they seem. Disgust precedes nausea; emetics are usually healthy, if unpleasant. Life might be characterized as the task of finding the strength to eat what your stomach needs, and vomiting back what your head or palate thought you wanted.

Political schizophrenia

(The Psychopathic God: Adolf Hitler, Basic Books Ltd., New York, Robert G.L. Waite, $19.95)

Robert G. L. Waite's remarkable book attracted my attention first because of the stunning portrait on the book's front cover, a painting by Klaus Richter in which Hitler appears like a potato-head with dementia praecox and eyes like searchbeams of blackest pitch. The title also intrigued me; one of the ideas our century has been readier to live with than any in the past, is that God, if he exists and oversees the deranged puppet show of human existence with approval, is a psychopath whose sadism and masochism are in an ever-accelerating race: "a manic-depressive rugby footballer", to use Peter Nichols' telling phrase from A Day in the Death of Joe Egg. Those who take this position, as I sometimes have, mainly with the idea of challenging the religious ethic that dictates surrender to the will of God, continue to put the case of Nazi gas chambers and asks, "Is the God who oversaw this the one into whose hands you wish to deliver your own future and that of your children?"

For while Hitler is often referred to as a demonic figure, he saw himself, and was seen by many of the German people, as a Messiah. Soldiers willingly rushed to their deaths with the name of Hitler on their lips, and the last thought of many of them was of the Führer whose benevolent and all-seeing eye witnessed and applauded their valor and their death. Small children died of fevers that ought not to have proved fatal, with the arm rigorously extended in salute, because they had been told it was every German's duty to die for the Führer. Hymns were rewritten making Hitler a fourth in the Trinity, a bridge between God and the people, and children were taught prayers in which supplications were made directly to Adolf.

It is a mistake to call such power demonic, for demons conspire against authority and Hitler was authority personified. His power over the lives, bodies, souls and daily acts of the German people was not demonic: it was Godlike.

How many of you remember Sunday school lessons about the patient Job, who was tested by God with trials and sorrows in spite of his probity? What is rarely emphasized in the retelling is that God (represented by the voice in the whirlwind) makes an argument for visiting unwarranted misfortunes on the head of Job which is identical with Hitler's assertions in defense of his extended Reign of Terror: I have the power, not you, and until you can command the whirlwind or draw up Leviathan with a hook, you just better keep your nose out of the decision-making process and take what I dish. That's only one of the stories from the Old Testament, not the most vicious, and the Old Testament is only one of many holy texts whose myths and ideals are sometimes noble, frequently barbaric, but almost invariably polluted somewhere with the notion of a divine creative power to whom we owe the love, devotion, fear and obedience that a child owes to its father.

Why a polluting notion? Because after subsidiary arguments are cleared away, the ultimate reason given for love and obedience to this Power is the naked appeal to force given in Job. I am the power.

The secret reason that the weak human submits to the will of the strong God is that if God can be placated or cajoled. His power may be doled out in small doses to the weak human who may, Godlike, strike at those weaker. And whenever a human being builds itself the totems, myths and authorities of a God, it is from the same spring: a feeling of weakness and inadequacy that cannot be overbalanced by anything less than

The cover portrait was done in 1941 by Klaus Richter.

Godlike authority over other human lives. If you can wire into that power, then it matters much less if inside yourself you feel like a contemptible low and snivelling worm.

Many psychotic and psychopathic personalities dream of defecating and urinating on the face of everyone in sight and out of sight because they believe, usually with justice, that those closest to them have so performed on their faces from their earliest years. They come to love it, and to believe that it is how people act to each other really. But few psychopaths ever get to dump thousand-ton loads of dung on the face of one of the great cosmopolitan centres of the world, London; and to have that deliciously reciprocated with shitloads on historic Berlin and Dresden. And fewer still get to piss steaming founts of poison gas into the emaciated faces of Jews, Poles and Slavs by the millions.

But the power to dominate people is not a real freedom, not unless it's accompanied by a capacity to reject that power. This Hitler did not have, because a fearfully negative image of himself was his only alternative. All of this Robert Waite helps to elucidate in his psychological biography of Hitler, reminding us that in megalomaniac, domineering pathologies such as Hitler's, there is invariably a sub-personality which considers itself contemptible and sub-worthy, and so long as dominance is sought such a figure can never be freed from that low self-image that lurks beneath. Successful domination provides a defense against awareness of that low self-image and therefore inhibits any capacity to deal with it.

It's been said of Napoleon that he suffered from a tragic delusion: he believed he was Napoleon. Because he managed to delude most of what was called the civilized world as well as himself, most of the world suffered the tragedy that might have been his alone in other circumstances. This is what happened to Hitler as well. He persuaded the Germany of the Third Reich to accept his own psychopathic estimation of himself, and so remade Germany and much of the world's remainder in the image of his own psychopathic soul.

All of this is only partly in review of Robert Waite's fine psychohistory of the Third Reich. The argument I've been pursuing here is one I've believed for many years (I've written a play on the theme), differs in its emphasis considerably from Mr. Waite's book, in which the religious speculations which I have advanced are not extensively discussed. The book provides much useful anecdotal and analytical material, it is decently if not spectacularly well written, and it is hard to imagine anyone short of William L. Shirer or Joachim Fest not benefiting from it. I think it's one of the few real books on Hitler, that is to say one of the few books that are brave enough to confront fully the enigma and whirlwind of incertitudes that crowd around the man, and one of the few that consistently avoid either pedantry or Police Gazette-style sensationalism.

Now... more than ever the RCMP offers a rewarding career

If you've ever considered a career in law enforcement, now's the time to talk to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The opportunities have never been greater.

For instance, the RCMP is accepting applications from both men and women, married and single. And the salary scale has increased considerably. It starts at $13,500. per year ($260. weekly) with regular increases to $19,000. ($365. weekly) in the first four years.

If accepted as a member of the Force, you'll receive intensive training in all aspects of police work such as law, investigation, first aid and community relations. Then you'll be posted to a detachment where there's every chance to put your knowledge and talents to work; to earn promotion and, equally important, be proud of what you're doing for yourself and for Canada as a member of one of the finest police forces in the world.

So if you're a Canadian citizen 18 or over and in good physical condition, think about a career with the RCMP.

The infinite gap between madness & an ordered image

In the field of art, madness has a ring of acceptability. The celebration of the suffering artist is a cult which enjoys continued renewal, and inordinate popularity with the young. Van Gogh, Munch, and Dali are the obvious kingpins of the artistic lunatic fringe. And for the U of T annual art poster sale, they range among the most marketable. Yet, it's no secret that these artists often constitute a phase in student appreciation of art, a fad which fades along with the interest in the artist as madman. What we have to recognize in the artists' works is not the ecstasy of madness, but its agony.

The main problem with judging a piece of art in terms of the artist's mental upheaval is that there's an infinite gap between the chaotic, tormented mind, and the ordered image on the canvas. Van Gogh's Starry Night could appear as merely a sleeping town beneath a magnificent, swirling sky. But sources tell us that the magnificence is really a sweep of religious and emotional turmoil, representative of Van Gogh's state of mind at the time. The knowledge of this enhances our appreciation of the ideas behind the painting but tends to distract us from the impact of its visual form.

Bosch, on the other hand, is a sane master of satire, though his paintings are gruesome fantasies with an overall piecemeal effect because of the myriad of slimy monsters. Human foibles assume the forms of bestial demons and the canvas appears to be madness itself. However, again, all the minutiae are swept together by motifs of time and the background landscapes. Order and madness can be merely the tools of a sane artist.

Salvador Dali is probably one of the most popular surrealists, and the question of whether he is mad or not is still a matter of contention. On numerous occasions he offers a public statement to briefly reassure the masses that "Yes, I'm mad", which often serves to appear the opposite. His paintings attempt to achieve an intense degree of realism in a warped context. Realistic depiction of objects is vindicated at the expense of meaning, and any meaning there is becomes exaggerated to the point of simplicity. This is not to say that I don't like Dali. His technical virtuosity simply exceeds his complexity. The technique of melting clocks and objects brings to mind more of the perceptions of a drugged mind, than an insane one.

Edvard Munch has achieved new exposure through Peter Watkins' film early this year on his life and work. Munch's eccentricity was played up against a background of the diseased bourgeois society that he witnessed and painted. The Scream is his most famous work and it epitomizes all the terror he felt. It is one of the few paintings in which our response approximates the artist's. There are no superfluous details - all is subsumed in the fear of the screamer's face. We don't have to know anything about Munch to know that the painting was a purging of his lunatic genius.

Canadian artists aren't isolated from this creeping disease either. Harold Klunder, although not mad is representative of what could be called new-wave madness. Violence is the ethic - "for the people, by the people, and against the people." His abstract oils are lathered attacks on the canvas. It would not be exaggerating to suggest a similarity between the destruction ideology of punk rock and Klunder's angry art, but he uses oils instead of grease.

For Michael Pellus, art is a way of staving off madness, what he calls "a study in writing". Pellus is busy serving a fourteen-year sentence in Leclerc Institute - a medium security Quebec prison, for trafficking heroin. Pellus's paintings will show young people peering through rips in the sky as a way to see the world through. Somehow, this seems more acceptable than Yoko Ono's recent best-selling postcard which is simply white with a hole in the middle entitled Yoko Ono: A Hole to See the Sky Through.

The CN Tower...perhaps an artistic exposition in madness, issuing in an era of insouciance where questions of "bigger and better" no longer grapple with questions of "why and worth?" It's not hard to see that madness in art involves both a concern for and a challenge to morality and other conventions. Societal and personal values hit the chopping block, and the artist tries to purge himself of the mental conflicts which these impose. We can't argue however with the notion that despite the artist's insanity, there is ordered expression, there is method in his madness.

Undisciplined but imaginative swirling kiss?

Daurio's story is evidence of an active, original imagination working well with language and structure. The flaws in the story are one's lack of discipline and restraint. I look forward to reading more of her work.

The poetry suffers from much the same problem as the two stories in the magazine. A lot of it is unexpressive and unevocative, offering no incentive to readers to explore them further. There are, however, some offerings well worth reading.

We read stanzas like "My mother is alive today - My father is so dead - That now when we remember him - My mother bows her head" from a poem by Chris Kurata called "A Freudian Lament" that make you wonder whether the editors have ever read a poem in their life.

On the other hand there are some interesting submissions. One poem by Dennis Stokes ("Swimming") uses evocative images to create rather pleasant effects. Another by D.J. Daly called "Paraphrase" is lyrical and makes excellent use of refrain and repetition.

All in all Grammatelton is worth reading. Flashes of promise penetrate through generally amateurish writing, making it sufficiently worthwhile to take the effort to find it.

U of T Fraternities: Virtue

By John D'Angelo

With the current renewed interest in fraternities, these restrictive, secret societies are surfacing once again and regaining public attention. But their past seclusion from campus life has left many of today's students uninformed and bewildered as to what goes on behind the doors of those greek letter embellished houses around campus known as "fraternities".

Ten Lean Years

The past ten years have been lean ones for the seventeen male fraternities and seven sororities, or female fraternities as they liked to be called (apparently a consequence of women's liberation) at U of T. The student movement of the late sixties, affectionately referred to today as the "counter-culture", had bred a disdain for the haughty, pompous, cliques which fraternities were characterized to be.

In the early seventies when "rushes" had to do with acid, not pledging, most fraternities had their memberships reach record lows. In fact, one U of T chapter is reported course which includes stopping at each of the sixteen fraternity houses on campus to down one point of beer, have met with active participation.

Is this then indicative of male fraternities? Are they mostly filled with beer guzzling pranksters who take delight in moving parked cars and stealing road signs? Although no fraternity member can deny the fact that all these things happen with some regularity, most will adamantly insist that fraternities perform meaningful, constructive services.

Secrecy and Ritual

There are various types of fraternities in North America. Many professions have their own societies, and secret men's clubs such as the Masons or Shriners abound. Greek letter fraternities date back to American independence in 1776. In that year, Phi Beta Kappa was founded at the College of William and Mary in Virginia.

Its members were mostly representatives of the Virginia House of Burgesses and soldiers in honorary organization for students achieving distinction in liberal arts studies.

The Kappa Alpha society, organized at Union College, Schenectady in 1825 is the oldest of the general fraternities as they exist today. It was patterned after the then still secretive Phi Beta Kappa fraternity (which had been installed at Union College in 1817) and although it was met with opposition, Kappa Alpha is reported to have been popular with students. Since then, Union College has been the founding place of five other fraternities, and it is to the Union Triad" of Kappa Alpha, Sigma Phi, and Delta Phi that the stated motives of scholarship and fellowship found in all fraternities today can be attributed.

Social Refuge

The popularity of fraternities in the early nineteenth century, and their covert existence resulted from the extremely regimented university educational system, which was mostly dedicated to teaching liberal arts. Students were not expected or allowed to refute the philosophies that were taught to

Hazing hi-links have been banned in many fraternities, following with "brotherhoods" drawing from chapters throughout North America.

The first such fraternity to be established at U of T was Zeta Psi, back in 1879, followed by Kappa Alpha in 1892, and Alpha Delta Phi in 1893. The first sorority was Pi Beta Phi, established at U of T in 1908. Many local fraternities existed on campus around the turn of the century, founded by students at U of T who organized their own secret societies. As these local fraternities grew, many were able to acquire their own house and some elected to amalgamate with larger existing American fraternities. An example would be Psi Delta Psi, founded in 1906, which later became a chapter of Delta Tau Delta in 1926. The only local fraternity on campus today is Phi Kappa Pi, and of the Greek letter fraternities, the only professional society is Xi Psi Phi of dentistry.

Chapters in Canada

Fraternities in Canada are all chapters of the large American fraternities. Each chapter has a charter with its respective fraternity associating the chapter with a particular school. The chapter houses, which are basically rooming houses with bedrooms, a kitchen, and living and recreation rooms, are run by the members (called "brothers" or "sisters") of the fraternity.

Weekly meetings are held in a chapter room (into which only fraternity members are allowed) where the financial and social affairs of the chapter are decided. Elected executives of the chapter include positions such as: president, vice-president, secretary, treasurer, social convener, chaplain, IFC rep, house manager, etc.

The basic structure of fraternities stresses the autonomy of each chapter. Aside from some general enveloping regulations, each chapter may establish its own set of by-laws. The most venerated document of a fraternity is the written code of objectives and ideals on which the fraternity was founded. The members of the fraternity are expected to conduct themselves in accordance with this "constitution" or "bond" which extols the virtues of excellence in scholarship, moral rectitude, and fellowship. Awards are offered by each fraternity to individuals who best exemplify these ideals.

Rush and Recruitment

In the first few weeks of every school year, fraternities try to recruit new members. Interested students, known as "rushes" are encouraged to visit chapter houses and meet fraternity members. Female fraternities have a highly organized "rush" program where girls, after signing up at Hart House, are invited to attend parties and dinners at all chapters on campus.

At the end of the "rush" period, should a student accept the bid to join a fraternity, a small ceremony is organized in which allegiance to the fraternity is pledged, and appropriately enough, the neophyte member is labeled a "pledge".

The "pledge class" then goes through an education period covering the history, organization, and ideals of the fraternity, some history of U of T, and even how to develop proper study habits. Duties of a male pledge class may include renovating a certain part of the chapter house, organizing a pledge party, and performing a service in co-operation with community groups.

At the conclusion of the to have dwindled to one active member. The construction of Roberts Library aggravated the situation by displacing several fraternity houses. Morale within the male fraternities had sunk so low that the Inter Fraternity Council (IFC), an organization which coordinates the campus fraternity system, had become defunct.

But the past few years appear to have been prosperous ones for fraternities. The IFC has been reinstated, and events such as the annual steeple chase race, in which each chapter submits a team of four members who "run" through a the Continental Army. Its expressed objective was to foster "friendship, morality, and literature" and it originated the features characteristic of the fraternity system: secrecy, an oath of allegiance, an "allegorical ritual" of initiation, mottos in Greek and Latin, a badge, a seal, a "grip" and passwords for recognition.

By 1781 the farternity had expanded to Yale and Harvard where, in 1831, influenced by nationwide agitation against secret societies, the secrets of the society were made public. Since then Phi Beta Kappa has been strictly an them. Chapel service and study period were a mandatory part of every day.

It was as a social refuge from these strict environments that fraternities were founded, and until the mid-1800's, members of many fraternities did not wear their fraternity pins on campus, nor did they speak openly of their fraternities in the university.

By 1855, the formation of the "Miami Triad" of Beta Theta Pi, Phi Delta Theta, and Sigma Chi, at Miami University, Oxford Ohio, paved the way for the establishment of the first continental fraternities, events as old friendships are renewed, and younger times are reminisced.

Next to the active members and alumni of a fraternity, the most influential component of fraternity life is the atmosphere of the university campus itself.

U.S. Fraternities Popular

In the U.S. fraternities are an institutionalized part of the educational system. Many colleges have a Dean of Fraternities, much like a Dean of Residence here, whose function includes distributing lists of names of all freshmen to each fraternity so that they can extend formal invitations to visit the house.

It is not uncommon for thirty to forty per cent of the student population of some small colleges to be members of a fraternity. Not only do the fraternities supply a major portion of student housing, they also practically monopolize every campus activity.

Ontario universities take quite a different view of fraternities. Queens and Waterloo for example, prohibit their existence, as did York University until an amendment to the Report of Rights and Responsibilities in 1969. According to Michael Morison, assistant vice-president at York, it was originally intended that the college system replace the traditional role of fraternities. The Osgoode Hall fraternity has existed there since 1960 despite the ban, but no other fraternities have successfully been installed since.

Here at U of T fraternities are effectively ignored by the administration; they are neither recognized as campus groups, nor admonished for any complaints the university receives about them.

According to Louis Reimer, coordinator of campus services, "fraternities are not recognized at U of T because of their restrictive selection processes. If any organization puts up any kind of barrier to entry (other than being a student of the university), then we will not recognize them."

Although fraternities here have never had official status, and hence have never been able to claim legitimate association with U of T, there was a time when they were an evident constituent of campus life. The Torontoensis, our student yearbook which ceased publication sometime in the fifties due to lack of interest, contained group photographs of all the fraternities on campus, and even included the Greek letters of a student's fraternity beside his or her name in the composite graduation pictures.

In contrast, today, even an administrator directly responsible for campus groups, Michael Dafee, Assistant to the Vice-President of Internal Affairs, admits that "fraternities are not very visible on campus at all". Of the more than 40,000 students attending U of T, less than 1,000 are active members of a fraternity, making the membership ratio about two per cent.

Be that as it may, things may well be improving for fraternities. Next year the male fraternities will have a booth in Hart House run by the Inter Fraternity Council, and this year the Council is compiling a brochure describing each chapter on campus. Such organized coordination amongst the male fraternities has been very rare in the past.

Hazing Banned

Hazing is defined by the Fraternity Executive Association (FEA) as "any action taken or situation created, intentionally, whether on or off fraternity premises, to produce mental or physical discomfort, embarrassment or ridicule". Deaths have been reported on U.S. campuses from hazing stunts that have gotten out of hand. Here at U of T rumor has it some initiates are forced to spend an evening locked in a closet, and until a few years ago, one fraternity actually branded the members of its initiation class.

The FEA strictly forbids any form of hazing, and as such, all fraternities on campus are theoretically obliged to refrain from it. Undoubtedly some form of hazing is still practised, although some fraternities such as Phi Delta Theta, Delta Upsilon, and Sigma Nu no longer engage in any type of hazing.

Once initiated, a student remains a brother or sister of the fraternity for life. It is because of the rituals and secrets of a fraternity that its members seem to share a higher level of camaraderies than would otherwise exist among students just living together in residence, and this friendship exists well beyond graduation day.

The alumni are an integral part of a fraternity, members of which comprise the board of directors of the chapter. The annual alumni banquets are extremely popular

An "Old Boy" remembers

These "brothers" were members of a fraternity which for many years occupied 91 St. George St., now home of The Varsity.

By JOHN D'ANGELO

Grant Loree is a relatively young "Old Boy" as alumni go. Having graduated with a Bachelor of Commerce degree in 1970, he weathered fraternity life through an era of marked declines in membership, and of "campus unrest" which denounced fraternities as elitists (although he admits there was never really any open harassment of fraternities).

Today Loree is employed as a salesman for an investment agency, but is still very much involved in fraternity lore, most prominently as a board member of Phi Delta Theta, a responsibility which includes managing the finances of the chapter house, and organizing alumni social events.

"The best decision I made in university was joining a fraternity, I learned as much there as I did in the classroom. When I'd be bidding (inviting students to join the fraternity), one thing I'd tell everyone was that a fraternity offered a broad education and a maturing process, something very important to students between the ages of eighteen and twenty-two.

"There are two basic aspects to fraternity life, the business side and the social side. When you run a fraternity, you're running a house worth hundreds of thousands of dollars, a kitchen, a bar... you learn how to get things to run smoothly, how to cooperatively plan a social event... how to handle crises, how to speak to committees.

"An awful lot of my close friends today were brothers with me in school. I have a much greater allegiance to my fraternity than to my college. I don't know if that's good or bad, but it's a fact. It seems to me that the spirit at U of T is rather limited. At homecoming last month there might have been 5,000 people in the stands. At a place like Michigan there'd have been 110,000 people. I suppose part of the problem is that in a city like Toronto most of the students hop on the subway and go home after classes... I don't think I'd have any more allegiance to my college whether I belonged to a fraternity or not... (but) I do come back to fraternity banquets and board meetings.

"Back when I was an active member, most of the brothers had a work hard, play hard attitude. Two of our guys went to Harvard. But in our spare time, and students have a mess of spare time, we tried to have as much fun as possible.

"I suppose for someone who doesn't particularly like doing things in groups, or is extremely independent or quiet, fraternities may not be for him, but given some effort, I think anyone can get something out of a fraternity.

"The most enduring experience of a fraternity is the comradeship of its members. It's not like a residence, where you get twenty or thirty students from out of the blue living together, and where you only get to know a few of them well... It's hard to make friends in classes too. There are only several guys I can think of that I got to know well from my commerce classes.

"It may seem chivalrous to someone outside the fraternity looking in that rushes can be 'blackballed' and rejected, but it's basically the same process everyone goes through in choosing friends, and it's the rituals and secrets that tie the friendships and allow the friendship to extend to more than just a handful of people."

Potterman

She sells seashells...

Last Wednesday was the opening night of the Toronto Arts Productions' The Sea. Written in 1973 by Edward Bond, the play's dramatic focus is on Hatch, a draper who projects onto the universe his own failure to forge an identity and earn respect despite his thirty years of obsequious service in a tiny East Coast village. Behind every frustration of his will he sees the threat of superior beings from outer space who have come to earth, and specifically his village, "the world's weak spot", to kill and to destroy.

As the drama unfolds, however, we are made to realize that Hatch is not in terror of space travellers or an enemy from another world, but of the "disciplined and madness" of this world, cause by the joyless sterility of modern science. "We're becoming the strange visitors to this world" explains Evans, Bond's spokesman, and the play's philosopher/fool, who lives in a shanty by the sea. Later Evans defines the universe as a life force ultimately mocking death, and proposes that only through moral involvement in society can the meaning for life be found. Where Hatch should have struggled to change the human condition, he sought the relative safety of conformity, and the price of his futile efforts of reconciliation is his sanity.

On the whole Martin Kinch's direction of The Sea is uninspired and the opening-night performance generally uneven. Kinch's first and most obvious mistake is his choice of music. Its eerie quality, so reminiscent of Star Trek soundtracks, violates the relationship between form and content, since the point of the play is that it is not about UFO's. The imposition of such music before each of the eight scenes reduces it to inappropriate and even melodramatic discord.

The set is eminently practical insofar as it allows the constant and haunting presence of the sea. Whether inside the draper's shop or the drawing room of the town matriarch, we are forced to be conscious of both its literal and symbolic power, respectively the brutal existential reality of death and the necessity of hope through rebirth and renewal. Yet the St. Lawrence stage seems merely empty rather than effectively stark, so that words are spoken as though in a vacuum or a very large rehearsal hall.

Bond employs humour, and specifically farce, in the play-within-a-play sequence and cliffside burial service of the final scene as a means of undercutting the truly wretched collapse of Hatch. When one reads the play, one isn't made aware of the undue length of the rehearsal of Orpheus and Eurydice. Unfortunately in the performance the pace of this segment was far too slow and pedestrian, though one must acknowledge the valiant struggles of Mary Savidge, as the overbearing Mrs. Rafi, to sustain a comic ebullience. Cerebus, dog-paddling across the Styx, and Orpheus, newly descended to Hades, warbling "There's No Place Like Home" were also effectively hilarious.

For the most part, however, the actors were uneasy and too often

Innis Pub: Berlin sin bin

Welcome to Berlin! Decadence, debauchery, booze and broads. Go straight along Bloor St., turn left on St. George until you reach Innis College and step into the Pub. From now till Saturday night, the Vic Drama Club is presenting Cabaret; showtime is at 9 but the doors open at 8 so you can get drunk beforehand.

Director Blake Heathcote has attempted an ambitious adaptation of the stage musical. The Innis Pub is an appropriate locale and provides an attractively disreputable nightclub setting. Audience participation is encouraged as the cabaret floosies sidle seductively up to the spectators. These are the Kit-Kat girls: a motley assortment of the good, the bad, and the ugly, mostly the latter.

But where were the whips and chains? Where was Frederick's of Hollywood? Where was the sadism, masochism, mondo-bondo, bondage and discipline? Berlin in the thirties was a pretty kinky place but this was poorly conveyed in the production.

The show's saving grace was the sleazy, satanic figure of the M.C. played by David Fallis. A fine performer, he stood tall where others stood short. He was both ominous and obscene, while his voice was far superior to everyone else's on stage.

Marie Stiller as Sally Bowles fared less well when forced to sing, but demonstrated no little talent as an actress. Sadly, her American lover played by Maitland McKimm did not sing one teeny-weeny note. He also smoked Canadian cigarettes. However, it was not totally a lost cause, for McKimm did improve in the stretch and occasionally really seemed interested in the play.

Cabaret did show flashes of real brilliance as one scene faded slickly into another. Credit for this goes to director Heathcote and his stage crew, ably led by Linda Kuerble. On the whole, the cast was spirited and enthusiastic, but often lacked bite. Still, the idea is a good one and the play has promise. Heathcote deserves praise for trying to bring a little decadence into everyone's life.

Daryl Pipa & Neil Michael Davidson

willingly sacrificed coherence of mood and the profundity of Bond's thought for the immediate, gratuitous laugh. Consequently, when Hatch's madness finally overwhelms him the audience is more titillated by the spectacle of endless three-yard pieces of 'Utrecht Velvet' being hacked by Hatch than awed by what should be a moment of existential frenzy.

What The Sea requires in the end is time. Once the cast laxes and settles into the run, many of the difficulties of the production can be overcome, and Kenneth Pogue, as Evans, and Douglas Rain, as Hatch, show particular promise. The production should be seen if only to experience the compelling beauty of the play itself.

Rich human

Somerset Maugham's 1921 play, The Circle, presents a point of view among a group of English men and women of that time. Awake and Sing by Clifford Odets, a play first performed February 19, 1935, is about the lives of some New York Jews during the Great Depression. Both plays are now slightly dated period pieces. Yet to a mature person, each play, if well acted (as The Circle was when I saw it during its present engagement at the Royal Alexandra), can still give pleasure. Any play that does not, first and foremost, entertain, no matter how noble "the message", is a failure.

Mr. Maugham was a skillful storyteller and more — he was a shrewd judge of people and human nature. The cynical Mr. Maugham may have disapproved of most or even all of the people in his play. But I don't doubt for a moment that in The Circle he accurately depicted upper class English life of the immediate post First World War era. The English rich, as Maugham saw them, are as worthy of being the subject of a play, as are the people in Mr. Odets' study of working class Americans during the Great Depression, whose concerns and worries and hopes for the future differ greatly from those of the cast of characters in The Circle.

Leo Tolstoy's Russian aristocrats are just as fit subjects for a novel, as are John Steinbeck's destitute Okies desperately seeking a better life in California. Rich people are just as "real" as poor people. (Poor: an archaic, now rarely used English word meaning monetarily disadvantaged and possibly also culturally deprived.) The problems of the rich, trivial and inconsequential though some of them may seem to us, are real enough to them.

To dismiss Maugham's comedy as ".... irrelevant to the average Varsity reader not only because the Federated Malay States no longer exist . . ." and ".... there is no redeeming social importance in the petty trials and tribulations of this small, moribund class of rich and super-arrogant parasites," as your reviewer did for the November 25 Varsity, is to write fatuous nonsense. When your theatre critic is older and wiser, more tolerant, more dispassionately interested in and curious about people and places and times other than those he can "relate to" — when he is as mature as some people might even think a university student ought to be now — he may understand that plays and novels about the rich are not inherently inferior to those dealing with the so-called working classes.

pg. 8 "... need another double live album like I need syphilis."
pg. 10 "... enjoy it like pigs in shit."
pg. 16 "... pissed off — really pissed off."
pg. 16 "... these two fucking essays."

This use of profanity and sexual allusion albeit occasionally humorous, is hardly acceptable convention for a newspaper, student or otherwise.

Review fatuous

As stilted as it sometimes gets, The Varsity is a good student newspaper. Notwithstanding the Trotskyists, Gays and other assorted radicals however, it has acquired one idiosyncrasy which is becoming progressively more annoying.

You seem to have relaxed your journalistic standards and succumbed to the "pedantic flatulency" of that which you have been so incessantly critical. I write of course in complaint of your reporters' Toike-style

Face each other from their flights
Green light burns white glass at last

They approach slow to pass
Their eyes meet they do not speak
One cane cursed the other
Carries bookbound words
The other has all too well heard

More than a 'symbol of human suffering'

It has been about two weeks since Correctional Services Minister Frank Drea announced the death of the Don Jail. Toronto's foremost "symbol of human suffering" will close at the end of the year and Drea has asked the Ministry of Government Services to destroy it in all haste. Strangely enough a few people are objecting. It seems odd that anybody could possibly want to save a grotesque monster where people who could not deal with our world, nor us with theirs, were kept, often beaten and sometimes hanged.

Many of us are probably glad to see a building of such a dubious character torn down, but it seems doubtful that its removal will belie the suffering it created nor stop it from happening in the future. On the other hand, there is a group of concerned individuals who are struggling to save the Don. Most of these people are connected, in some way, to historical, arts and architectural schools and societies in the city, yet even for these people the Don Jail poses a somewhat difficult question as to what is to become of it. This past week a petition directed to the Davis Government was circulated asking for the preservation of the building as well as the initiation of a study of the possible re-use of the Jail.

Even at the time of its construction, 1859-1864, the Don Jail was out of date; half a century before English social reformer Jeremy Bentham had suggested that prisons could be places of rehabilitation rather than houses of punishment. Yet William Thomas designed the Don with the intent and, to some degree, the image of the prison of Newgate, in London, England, one of the exact exemplars of what Bentham was fighting against.

Newgate was built in the 1770s when felons were felons and that was that. When one went through the small door in the immense unbroken wall with its pediment hung with chains (instead of garlands) one understood one's chances of leaving.

I was over at the Don Jail on Sunday taking pictures for this article when a Metro Toronto Police car drove up. Two of the city's finest got out and one opened the back door to the car and a man with an amazing bruise over one eye got out. With one constable on either side, the three of them walked to the front door of the 113 year old building. One of the policemen pushed a button on the door sounding a buzzer inside that I'm sure can be heard a block away. The fearsome stone face on the keystone of the doorway stared down at the three of them and at me out on the street. In a moment the heavy door swung open and the man and the two officers disappeared inside. The great door swung shut with a reverberating bang.

It struck me that this building was unlike any other building I knew in Toronto. The generally meaningless, functionalist catch-all, "Form follows Function" came to mind and it seemed that this building's archaic and gruesome business had been very well displayed in the shaping and detailing of its being.

Right now there are a number of people making suggestions as to the jail's fate. Frank Drea has said he would like it as flower beds for the old age homes in the Riverdale area, tended by his recently announced chain-gangs. Other people have suggested a youth hostel and things of that ilk. A group of fifth year students here at the School of Architecture have begun their own investigation into the building's possibilities.

One suggestion that was made to me was a reference to a 1966 scheme for Ellis Island off New York City by Philip Johnson (art historian-architect of the court yard of the Museum of Modern Art and Theatre of the Dance in Lincoln Centre, both in NYC). The island had been an immigration station where about 16 million people entered the United States. Johnson proposed, among other things, that the roofs of the buildings be removed and vines and flowers be planted so as to engulf the structures. Walkways would be constructed and people could come and contemplate the fates of the people who entered the country through that point.

Whether petitions, letters to editors and MPPs, or articles like this will save the Don is hard to say, especially since the government does not fall under the jurisdiction of one of its own acts, The Heritage Act, which allows a 90 day freeze on any demolition if a historical value is suggested. Needless to say the government doesn't need a city demolition permit either. Nevertheless the jail is an important example of a certain perspective of how to treat criminals, sadly still held by many. Possibly by maintaining the physical presence of the Don, they can be dissuaded.

Gondos shafts Lizst fans

While the Grey Cup was in full swing Sunday afternoon, a few dozen people sat huddled in the Hungarian Canadian Cultural Centre for the piano recital of Ivanfai-Gondos. Huddled is the only suitable participle in this instance, for it was so cold in the concert hall that coat and gloves were necessary throughout. Add to that an extremely noisy ventilation system and one can understand why Mr. Gondos did not feel particularly trailing off to put forth his best. However, that does not really excuse the travesty which ensued.

It had been announced that the program would include Liszt's B minor Sonata, some Hungarian Rhapsodies, and the pianist's own October Legend. Suspiciously, no printed program was available on the day of the concert. In actual fact, not one note of Liszt was played during the entire two hours. From his opening number, it was obvious that Gondos felt nothing but contempt for his tiny cold audience, and consequently treated us to his own compositions non-stop. He did not even have the courtesy to announce his intentions until halfway through the performance, at which point he deigned to mumble some Liszt-like titles, carefully avoiding the name of the composer. It is quite possible that a few of that noble gathering walked away believing they had heard some Liszt.

The compositions of Gondos, as represented in this recital, displayed the same rapid pseudo-virtuosity for which Liszt railed against Thalberg one hundred and forty years ago. Mundane themes were persistently surrounded by sweeping arpeggios or chromatic scales trailing off the edges of the keyboard. The harmonic progressions were painfully predictable and nothing emerged which one could call memorable.

A few biographical details might go a long way to explaining Mr. Gondos' compositional style (or lack thereof). Since coming to Canada from Hungary in 1954, he has performed at the Eaton Auditorium, Massey Hall, St. Lawrence Centre, and the Cleveland Music Hall, but appears to have settled into hotel lounge gigs as of 1969. Currently, he works out of Huntsville, entertaining at one of the resorts. Now, pianists who manage to maintain both classical and popular facets of the repertoire deserve much credit. However, to announce a 'serious' music program and then proceed with slightly superior Muzak is not only false advertising, but insulting.

The cocktail lounge clichés were in evidence during the first two selections, a Chorale Prelude and a Sonata. Gondos consistently over-pedalled and revealed a lazy technique. With his Concert Waltz, these clichés moved to the fore, remaining there until the programme finally ended. The second half of his recital degenerated to such a level that a piece, announced as "Variations on a theme by Tchaikovsky" was actually a tedious compilation of the Beatles' "Yesterday", "Michele" and "Something". As the final mockery, Gondos closed his program with Chopin's Eb Nocturne, replete with errors.

The October Legend was the only piece that was consistent with the previously released program. Compositionally, it was somewhat better than the rest of his works, although borrowing heavily from Chopin. Who could take it seriously, though, when it was wedged in between "Love is Blue" and the Chopin Nocturne?

Mr. Gondos has obviously been playing for inattentive and/or uncaring audiences for too long, and his bitterness showed in full force Sunday afternoon. The only reason that the music lovers present remained in their seats for the last part of the concert was to ask for their money back. Personally, I don't blame them.

Mixed bag inconsistent; Bayaderka proves a bitch

Last Wednesday at the O'Keefe Centre The National Ballet of Canada presented its first mixed program of the fall season (there were two) for the second time and although this showing was on the whole superior to the November 23rd (Sunday) performance, the Company still has a fair distance to travel as far as the work Bayaderka is concerned.

On the program with The Dutch National Ballet's Collective Symphony and Ann Ditchburn's Mad Shadows, Bayaderka (Act IV: Kingdom of The Shades) is the fourth act of La Bayadere, a 100 year old masterpiece creation of the 19th century choreographer Marius Petipa. Only this final act is performed today but it has been preserved intact.

Bayaderka is important for its dancing rather than the libretto and you might say it is a bitch for any company to perform.

The story told in Act IV of La Bayadere is a dream. The young Indian warrior Solor dreams that he sees his beloved Nikiya in the Kingdom of the Shades but she continually escapes his grasp. Nikiya was a beautiful temple dancer or bayadere who was murdered and now moves among the world of deceased bayaders, which is dominated not by the mood of death but of eternity. It is this atmosphere of eternity, accomplished by uniformly repeated movements, that is highly difficult to achieve and also absolutely essential.

In the National's production the work opened with 24 female corps members (the number varies) dressed as bayaderes in white tutus. They slowly entered one by one in profile and performing arabesques penches down a ramp at the back of the stage and continued to do so until they were four rows deep moving horizontally across the stage.

The repetitive movement of the bayaderes at the beginning and other steps executed in a similarly synchronized fashion later in the piece are integral to Bayaderka because they create a spatial setting for all the other dancing, by Solor, Nikiya, and three soloists, and it is the only setting. There is no scenery nor is there any significant dramatic tension to add depth and weight to the work.

The National's female corps, frequently failed to carry the movement along as one cohesive, sweeping gesture and missed an acute conjunction with Stravinsky's Symphony in C. Thereby they failed to establish a feeling of infinity.

All however was not lost as the other roles in Bayaderka were well done. Peter Schaufuss danced Solor on Wednesday and whereas he made a couple of minor technical errors (a Schaufuss rarity) he injected the role with superb vitality. Solor, the only living character in this work, was made vibrantly human through Schaufuss' leaps and turns which he richly textured with scissoring of the legs and kicks while soaring high in mid-air.

Schaufuss' interpretation of Solor, which he was dancing for the first time, seemed to be based on man as a passionate animal and had been meticulously thought out down to the clothing. He discarded the vest which would have matched his glittering gold trousers and danced both bare-chested and bare-headed (he wore only a thin head-band) in contrast to Frank Augustyn who danced Solor at the Sunday performance. Schaufuss' marvellous sense of abandon in his dancing combined with the sparseness of his costume exposed Solor's spirit, vulnerability and hence, his humanity.

Augustyn, dancing in both a beige vest and turban and looking every inch the Indian prince, gave the audience a believable if insufficiently vital character.

Karen Kain, who was Nikiya on Sunday, and Mary Jago, who danced the role beside Peter Schaufuss on Wednesday, gave equally credible performances of this once enchanting young woman who was transformed through death into an unexpressive ethereal creature. Jago's performance remained the more luminous.

Jago can call upon a very delicate, almost restrained, quality in her dancing when the situation requires. Here, seemingly setting herself a defined range for epaulement and port de bras, Jago moved with a textural softness that made Nikiya as light and intangible as the air around her.

She was of course aided in this characterization by her partner Schaufuss and the striking contrast he provided through his own bold statement that he was a full-blooded human male and yet, emphatically, not earthbound.

Jago and Kain also shared the leading female role in Collective Symphony, the successful choreographic conspiracy of The Dutch National's three artistic directors. Set to Igor Stravinsky's neoclassical Symphony in C, the work was performed more smoothly Wednesday night through no fault of Kain who happened to be dancing it Sunday.

Collective Symphony was beautiful to watch and a welcome addition to the National's repertory. Like a kaleidoscope, it unraveled into a fascinating narrative about human relationships which were compellingly expressed through the dancers' connecting and disassociating movements.

The final dance on this program, Ann Ditchburn's Mad Shadows was performed admirably on both evenings and loses very little with repeated viewing. The story of a morally and spiritually deteriorating family in Quebec, Mad Shadows is characterized by Ditchburn's uniquely sensual approach to movement.

The National's dancers are now thoroughly familiar with the piece and each seems to have brought his or her own particular assets to the role portrayed. Wednesday's cast was as credible as Sunday's but the lines of tension were different. I preferred Mary Jago's Sunday performance of Louise, the aging narcissistic mother, over Kain's. As a dancer, Kain was superb, but Jago gave Louise's personality a raw edge through light, choppy sections of movement.

Through movement that was disturbing, the kind of thing that makes you shift your seat in the subway, Jago's Louise became a woman who was clearly mentally disturbed. More than a dotting, confused mother, Jago pointed out that Louise's sanity was in peril and thereby gave Mad Shadows a twist that made it more intellectually satisfying.

Lowe blows ill wind

Graham Parker has problems. Most artists do, but only about a third of Graham's are of his own making. After last year's superb Heat Treatment every rock critic in North America, together with the seven or eight people who paid money for the album, has been waiting for the messiah's next miracle.

Accordingly Stick To Me has been greeted with reviews which range from mild disappointment to cries of outraged betrayal. 'What, Graham, you dared record something which wasn't the greatest album ever?!!' It's a rough position to be in, particularly as Bruce Springsteen continues his project to become the Thomas Pynchon of rock. Parker can't even tour North America as a headliner and he's already washed up in the eyes of those who hailed him as their saviour.

The critics aside, Stick To Me has more than a few flaws. The greatest of these is its production. I don't know what Graham and the boys see in Nick Lowe who produced their first album (muddily) but was absent when they smuggled Heat Treatment into the can. Here he is at the mixing board with a first rate vocalist and the tightest, most versatile back-up band in the business working like dumpstermen on a Ruthenian holiday, and all we can at the other end is the famous wall of undistinguished sound. Perhaps it's the agony of too much choice. If you're producing The Who there's no question about the role of the drums. The Rumour presents real problems — if you fill the sonant space with Martin Belmont's guitar where do you put Bob Andrews' keyboards? But then why add the horns, the strings, and who o why those chickie singers (who seemed to have learned their harmonies from Bryan Ferry's Sirens)?

It may be that Parker and band are destined to a career of making albums which are pale shadows of their abilities but let's all hope not. The New Wave bands have reminded anyone who's listening that high energy is absolutely necessary to the production of rock but sheer energy has left us with a succession of albums which have one sound each. Television does this; the Sex Pistols do that; Patti Smith does something else — but for a varied listening experience you have to fall back on those CBGB sampler discs.

Parker's range is not limitless. His attempt at a Springsteen tone-poem ("Heat In Harlem") falls flat when set against 'Rosalita' or even 'Jungleland' and his hommen really should spend a couple of months in Philly before the next album. But I'll bet Bob Marley doesn't send him telegrams advising him to give up reggae, and only the Pistols can bet 'Clear Head' in the smash-the-listener's-face school. Parker's long suit, however, is street-hard rhythm and blues. Anyone who can listen through 'Soul On Ice' without moving must be a closet - catatonic. It's a bit tricky, your legs might knot, but it's worth ending up on the floor once in your life.

A friend of mine told me that hearing Heat Treatment on the radio dissuaded him from suicide. I'm not sure how many lives Stick To Me will save but if you've got a buddy on the borderline there'd be worse Christmas gifts.

Allan Lamartine

Pathetic fallacy at Con Hall

Many of the best musicians around today have allied themselves with the progressive jazz movement. People like Ponty, Jan Hammer, and Keith Jarrett are the technical virtuosos of contemporary music. Unfortunately, technique has nothing to do with writing ability. Jan Hammer's music is esoteric because it is, for the most part, very bad. Even Jarrett, while capable of penning solo piano works of the highest calibre, has written a score of clunkers.

The problem seems to be one of direction. The new jazz artists were raised on rock and the old jazz tradition. They've inherited the respect for technique from people like Coltrane and acquired the self-indulgent rambling style from the free-form nonsense of the sixties. It is not surprising, then, to find so many progressive jazz bands writing what are essentially elaborated versions of "In-a-gadda-da-vida" fraught with pointless noodlings from their respective instruments. The 'tone picture' has crept back into modern music, and God knows we could do without it.

But in the midst of this chaotic program music, a few stars shine. Jarrett is certainly the master of the solo work. And Weather Report is the leader of the ensemble, highly textured, highly structured jazz composition. Basing much of their work on Latin-American rhythms, and using synthesizers intelligently (not an easy thing to do, it would seem), Weather Report has produced some of the most listenable modern jazz to come along in some time. That's not to say they are perfect, they have penned a few rambling, rather silly mood pieces, but for the most part they have managed to avoid these flashy clichés of most of their genre.

Sunday night, Weather Report gave two sold-out shows at Con. Hall. They played a good selection of their work, taking representative compositions off of most of their albums and playing at least one by each member of the band. This was not always wise. At least one piece was of their more early, rambling style. Also the bass solo by Jaco Pastorius, while initially fascinating, was much too long. Weather Report works best in a tight rhythmic structure with a conscious melodic progression.

Perhaps the most impressive fact about this band in concert is the fullness of their sound. For a four man band (the percussionist who appears on the Heavy Weather album was not there) they have an incredibly lush sound. This is due largely to their drummer, Acuna, and the multi-keyboard caisthenics of Josef Zawinul.

Weather Report is not everyone's cup of tea. They are often confused with progressive rock losers like Van Der Graff Generator, and do not fare well in the comparison. That's because Weather Report don't have the same self-important inability. Their last few albums have been honest attempts to create an original sound through the use of electronic instruments, tight melodic structures and Latin rhythms. They do not always succeed in shaking off the nonsensical aesthetics of their fellow travellers, but when they do, they're great. And they put on a fine concert, to boot.

Bored Boz brandishes bland beat

Boz Scaggs does have a way with rhythm. Constantly. Incessantly. Forever and ever, Amen. That rhythm pervades this album Down Two, The Left, to such a chronic degree that it leaves your time-keeping foot limp from the monotony of the 70 Hertz thump.

It could be caution on Scaggs' part — not wanting to rock the boat of his success too vigorously. The result however, is an inoffensive conglomeration of cuts that are even too bland for a run-of-the-mill, suburban shopping centre sound system.

Apologies to Scaggs fans, but the man's voice whines its way through the 'ballads' "Tomorrow Never Came" and "We're Waiting", and later in the faster paced (?) "Still Falling for You", that whine increases to an even more grating level of irritation.

Scaggs has probably, and luckily, found a comfortable niche in the corner of a neutral disco, especially after the successes of his previous albums, Silk Degrees and Slow Dancer, and there he plans to stay. Formulas are easier to concoct after the first couple of tries.

It's hard to say what exactly is right with this album — the production is good, and perhaps you could see some light in the arranging, but that droning rhythm...

One suggestion for optimum listening pleasure: turn on the vacuum cleaner, and your carpet will never be cleaner, that beat is great to set yourself to an efficient pace.

Music no bust behind Gino's lust

To realize that Gino Vanelli is a malignant animal is to see him in concert. Let's face it, for many people Vanelli's image as a modern day Casanova, whose mere presence is aesthetically pleasing to the voyeurs of the Playgirl crowd, tends to detract from the degree of his musical credibility. Vanelli himself is largely to blame in this respect for failing to veto an insidious promotional campaign originating with his 76 tour; and with encouragement of this kind it is little wonder the press tends to speak of him in monolithic terms. To see him in concert however, is to realize that Gino Vanelli has more going for him than GINO VANELLI (in neon please).

At the Gardens last Thursday night, Vanelli and band combined to do more than perpetuate a tiresome myth. There were of course all the trappings one expects in the person of a bona fide Lothario, but it all seemed rather harmless against a background of powerful drumming and brassy keyboard work. Narcissism aside, the man's voice is definitely something to be reckoned with: one minute shrilling in a curious vibrato, huskily whispering the next.

Vanelli's strongest point, however, is his six man band. Sometimes stretching into five resonant keyboards the drums, the usual fare consisted in three synthesizers, two percussionists and drums. Notice no guitars-ergo a minimum of amplifier noise. That every instrument went directly into the P.A. should have accounted for an unusually clean sound, but theory often remains just theory. Everytime the pace slowed to a ballad, the designs of an improperly grounded synthesizer proved too much for Vanelli's tender efforts.

To argue that Vanelli's music is a composite of the keyboard dominant style of music pioneered by Stevie Wonder is to say nothing enlightening. Granted, Wonder is not unknown to Vanelli, but by the same token Wonder has no honorific patent that excludes all others from writing keyboard music designed to usurp the place of the traditional electric guitar. Moreover, there are too many distinctive subtleties in Vanelli's music to substantiate a charge of fraud.

By far the most pleasing pieces of the evening were those Vanelli thoughtfully termed 'experimental'. "Powerful People" for example, explained away the need for a bass guitar, while the third movement from the title track of Pauper In Paradise (his latest album) was a refreshing change from the commonplace and the danceable. Unfortunately, the studio version of "Pauper In Paradise" has orchestrated most everything into the background.

I'll confess that when I walked into the Gardens I didn't expect Vanelli would do much more than continue the sex myth already spoken of, but having seen him in concert I will admit that there's more than meets the eye: there's the music. And as far as I'm concerned that's what it's all about.

While opening acts are generally poorly served, Lisa Del Bello was an unhappy exception. Even with Vanelli's uncluttered lights and sound-system, Del Bello proved as uninteresting as the sound track to Carwash. There are two points on which she needs some instruction: 1) Too many people feel uncomfortable when disco music is transported from the familiar atmosphere of the informal club to the solemn atmosphere of the concert stage. 2) Because the 'times are a changing' our patience with rising disco stars decreases in proportion as the temple falls down around them. Del Bello's attempt to cause waves had about as much success as a pebble on a frozen pond.

Michael O'Keefe

Pianist too good to be true

William "Fingers" Aide proved last Friday night that his nickname is no joke. Not that this comes as any surprise, for this professor from the University of Western Ontario's Music Faculty has long been the exhibitor of a formidable technique. But fingers aren't everything. No, I'm not about to pull out the old adage about finger flexibility meaning rapid virtuosity and little else, but I do believe that an extraordinary technique can often detract from the musicality in a performance.

On Friday night the proof was in the playing, and to demonstrate my point I'll work backwards, beginning with the encores. First came the Chopin Etude in F major, Op. 10, No. 8, a fun and flashy little number that Aide often pulls out because he seems to be able to play it faster and more fleetingly than anyone else, excepting maybe Maurizio Pollini. But my main criticism here is that the performance was more Aide than Chopin. For instance, there is a beautiful transition section in this etude that pulls the listener back to the tonic, and I was so caught up in Aide's racing over the keys that I almost missed the passage. Poor Chopin's lovely chromatic harmonies were almost lost under Aide's dazzling, hypnotic technique.

However, Franz Liszt asserted himself forcefully in the second encore, La Campanella. Here the whole point of the piece is virtuosity, for the music consists of nothing but a single melody repeated, each time with a different set of acrobatics, until the whole thing dissolves into a plethora of trills and octaves. This was an exciting performance, designed to get the audience on its feet. It succeeded, because Aide can pull off a virtuoso piece like this without vince or grimace, and more power to him.

I suppose the whole question here is one of balance. For someone to whom virtuosity is almost second nature, there must always be the temptation to exploit that gift simply for thrill value, which does a disservice to the music at hand. This happened in Aide's performance of the Chopin Ballade in G minor, which was taken a shade too fast and played with an almost blasé assurance that betrayed an over-familiarity with the work. To a certain extent this criticism holds true for the first part of the program, which included works by Scarlatti and Mozart. The two Scarlatti sonatas were performed with clarity and no little panache, but the Mozart K. 311 lacked the subtlety of phrasing and shading which would have made the interpretation a more sensitive and intimate one.

What convinces me of Aide's really solid musicianship, however, was his performance of the E major Scherzo of Chopin. It's interesting that Aide chose this particular one because it is not as flashy or popular as the other three, and relies instead on some rather daring transitions. Its short tentative theme questions rather than storms, and it was this musical aspect that Aide brought out so convincingly, not allowing the scurrying passagework to obscure it. The Nocturne, Op. 27, No. 2, also by Chopin, was played with the same intrinsic musicality, and with a real feeling for the harmonic beauty and lyricism of the work.

The lyrical parts of the Liszt Sonata, which concluded the program, were brought out in the same way. However, the pacing of this performance was not altogether satisfactory. Indeed, this is difficult to do because the work is a continuous one and achieves its unity or coherence through transformation of several "key" motives. There were some really sublime moments, particularly in the slower middle section, and some momentum was gained in the fugue, but all in all I found the interpretation choppy.

Tomorrow night at 8 p.m. Ballet Ys presents Seven Ys Pieces, a choreographic workshop, at their studio, 366 Adelaide St. East. Kitchener's Dance Plus Four will also perform. Dec. 1-4 at 8 p.m. and Dec. 4 at 2:30 p.m. Admission $2. You might be sitting on the floor — take a cushion along. Info: 364-3428.

Also on Thurs., at 8:30 p.m., Rimmon performs at 15 Dance Lab. A local contemporary troupe, they can be seen until Sat. 115a George St. $3. Seating for only 40 so reserve at 869-1589.

And now, the moment you've all been waiting for... well, almost. The National Tap Dance Company of Canada, (NTDCC) performs for the first time ever at Minkler Auditorium, Seneca College. This troupe was formed in conjunction with the Hoofers' Club last January and the lineup of their first program looks good — an opportunity to see tap live as well as to learn more about it as an art form. The works are Tapestry, showing tap's development over 4 centuries, Grandpa's Spells, based on the music of Jelly Roll Morton, it's a bit of dance theatre as "old Vaudeville performers" recall their various pasts, an exhibition number showing the scope of tap's various forms and finally, there's a Tap Challenge which is unlike the Pepsi Challenge and more like a duel. Call the NTDCC for info: 363-5707.

If hoofers don't excite you there's something coming up on campus that might. The Toronto Dance Theatre will present 4 new works Dec. 14, 15 and 16 at the MacMillan Theatre, Edward Johnson Bldg. Recital and A Simple Melody by Peter Randazzo will be performed along with Danny Grossman's Cruelous Schools of Theatrical Dance, Part I and David Earle's as yet untitled piece based on the Phaedra myth. Tickets are a steal at $5 for adults and $3.50 for students. By reserving today, students can save 50 cents and adults save $1. Call TDT: 423-7016.

Church choir concerts are thick as fleas these days, so I can only mention a few below. Anyway, tonight at 8:30, Davis and the TSO repeat yesterday's program of Ravel and the Brahms German Requiem, with soloists Benita Valente and John Shirley-Quirk, and the Mendelssohn Choir. Massey Hall, rush seats at 7:00.

The Faculty Opera Department's production of Benjamin Britten's comic opera Albert Herring opens Friday in MacMillan Theatre. Student tickets are mighty reasonable at $2.50, and an authentic English libretto will make all the difference to those of you who could never understand opera's appeal as drama. Performances start at 8:00 Dec. 2, 3, 9 and 10, with separate Friday and Saturday casts.

Also Friday, the six-year-old Concord Quartet (named after the Mass. town, not the concept of euphony) plays Yves's Quartet No. 2 — one of his finest works — and Beethoven's Op. 18-6. St. Lawrence Centre at 8:30; $5.50 and $6.50. In Massey Hall, mezzo Jeany Norman gives a solo recital, tickets $4-$12. Not only a fine artist, but outsizes every singer in the world today.

Saturday at 8:30, the Toronto

Chamber Society presents a Christmas Concert in St. Paul's Church (Queen and Power Sts.). Vivaldi, Schuetz, Bach, $5. The New Music series at the St. Lawrence features the Extended Vocal Techniques Ensemble in a program called "Vocal Fireworks with Electronics" (no kidding). 8:30, students $3.

Sunday at three, the Orford Quartet finishes its Beethoven cycle with Opp. 131, 18-4, and 59-3. Students $4 in Walter Hall. At the Grange (behind the A.G.O.) soprano Claudette LeBlanc gives a free solo recital. Another soprano, Hae-Suck Chol, sings in the St. Lawrence Town Hall at 7:00. The Paul Brodie Sax Quintet is free in Hart House at 8:00. TSO association concertmaster Jascha Milks plays in Met. United Church at seven. Free.

The R.C.M. Trio — three distinguished Conservatory teachers — offer a recital in the Concert Hall Monday at 4:00. Students $1.50. In Seneca's Minkler Auditorium, William McCauley conducts the North York Symphony in popular selections. Starts 8:00, $4.50 and $5.75.

The TSO concert next week features violinist Henryk Szeryng in the Sibelius Concerto. Also programmed is Strauss's Ein Heldenleben, Tuesday and Wednesday at 8:30.

movies

It's the time of year when most of us have hallucinations enough, brought on by essays, deadlines, overwork and dreams of Wayne Kramer. It's also the time of month when the repertory houses haven't sent me their programs. That leaves us with a thin Watsup but we aren't going to the movies anyway.

Tonight: Cinema Lumiere has a combination of social realism and athletics: Deep End (which may or may not be about polliwog class) and The Loneliness of The Long Distance Runner. The New Yorker opens the week with a program of women's films with Jill Johnson, Antonia (which is almost a textbook on how to make a documentary as well as being an exploration of a woman's battle with an entrenched system; in this case the belief that only men can conduct symphony orchestras), Beauty Knows No Pain, and Agnes Varda's Lion's Love. The Science Centre series of Chinese films continues with The Unforgettable Battle, a tribute to the Long March.

Thursday: The kind and gentle people at U of T Films are offering two classics of the contemporary art film with The Deep and The Front. The New Yorker has a pair of the traditional essay time dreamscapes with If and The Trial (which is guaranteed to cure you of any desires to petition for anything). And the Science Centre offers us a touching tale of a brave woman who struggles to increase agricultural productivity in far Tien Shan, Red Blossom of the Tien Shan Mountains.

Friday: The New Yorker begins a week's run of the gospel according to Paranoias, otherwise known as the Panoramic Plot. It is concerned with the theory that Christ rigged his own crucifixion, that the nails were rubber and driven through the fingers anyway, that the spear thrust in the side was an elongated magic marker, and that Christ's ostensible death on the cross was really the effect of a heavy dose of an opiate. Fascinating stuff I suppose and just right for the Christmas season (the star over the stable, as you may have guessed by now, was an oil soaked bullrush tied to a kitestring). U of T Films refuses to give up and instead repeats and tonight's struggle at the Science Centre concerns the development of a people's method of constructing oil derricks.

Saturday: The Science Centre switches continents and moves to Germany. The tour is guided by director Hark Bohm. Landmarks decried include Tachetan der Indian-junge and Ich Kann Auch 'ne Arche Bauen. The first is concerned with Indian slavery in Montana while the second deals with a group of children in Hamburg who while away the rainy winter hours by building an ark and capturing animals.

Sunday: The AGO offers Feuillade's Fantomas and Renoir's classic La Bete Humaine. Innis and Regus Films have their usual triple bill of cartoons at 2:00, silents at 5:00 and Gone With the Wind at 8:00.

Monday: Someone's showing something somewhere but the only show in town is in the Review Office where Steve (brilliantly portrayed by Ted Nugent) and his demented assistant B.J. (Michael J. Pollard) are performing bizarre post-modern sculptural experiments on the frontal lobes of Ann and Ann (both played by Fay Wray). Meanwhile, in the basement Paul (Bud Cort) is tending his mutant crustaceans and amphibian fowl and Neil (David Hemmings) is bargaining with that famous marine mercenary Orca (Martin Heavisides). The outside world proceeds, little thinking of the holocaust about to be unleashed. Only little Kim (Jackie Coogan) knows. He is at the police station trying to convince the desk sergeant (Bob Klotz) of the danger. But the sergeant doesn't believe a word and they look Kim away next to a ragged drooling prisoner (Wayne Kramer). The painted brazen hussy (Kristine) tries to entice our two fall guys, but instead catches the eye of the hauling and sadistic guard, Arthur The K. Will the world be saved? It might be, but only if the hero E. A. Godot (John Wilson) arrives on time...

Tuesday: More Sinology (perhaps we can send them some Kleenex) at The Science Centre with from Victory to Victory. And that about winds things up except to bid farewell for the holidays. I won't be around next week so... drink lots, eat more and spare a thought for Wayne Kramer's Christmas dinner, that moldering curst of Wonderbread, that stale Coke with the cigarette butt in it...

art

The campus galleries are stocked with good shows. Expressive Realism from the brush of R.F.M. McInnis is featured at Hart House. David Johnson's acrylics at OISE are in the same vein as the illustrious Spadina artist Gershon Iskowitz. Till Nov. 30. Vic's New Academic Building has two artists, David Blostein "The Incurable Illustrious", and Allen Smutny with a collection of prints. "The Group of One" is an art exhibition by Max Epstein and consists of paintings and graphics celebrating Canadian unity. Till Dec. 22 at 180 Bloor St. W. Harold Klunder could be Epstein's Diametric opposite with his 'angry art' at the Sable-Castelli Gallery, till Dec. 3.

Matisse lovers, if you have the time, visit the Detroit Institute of Arts over the holidays. Till Jan. 8, it features an acclaimed exhibit of Matisse's Paper Cut-Outs.

Laurentian artists have received good exposure recently in Toronto galleries. The Gallery Mox has a show by Marce-Aurele Fortin till Dec. 15. And the AGO has put together a collection entitled The Laurentians: Painters in a Landscape, including works by Marce-Aurele Fortin, Goodridge Roberts, Jacques de Tonnancour, Patrick Landale, and others. However, the themes of these works are distinctly personal, not nationalistic.

The AGO is in its last week of the Impresario-Ambroise Vollard exposition. See it before Sunday. The Henry Moore drawings and Gerald Ferguson paintings are both shows that will continue till Dec. 31.

The Macdonald Gallery in the Government Buildings continues its Japanese Canadian Centennial Art Exhibition till Dec. 4. Also in ethnic art, Harbourfront has resurrected a dying Polish art called Wycinanki, the art of paper cut-outs. The show is a collection of 200 of these pieces by various artists. Till Nov. 30.

Silk screening is one of Toni Onley's best techniques and can be seen at the Gallery Pascal across from the AGO till Dec. 7. Kim Ondaatje also includes silk screens in her multimedia exhibition at the Scarborough College Gallery, till Dec. 5.

John MacGregor is at the Isaacs Gallery. His New Paintings are pleasantly nostalgic of New York abstractionists in the late 50's and early 60's. The Prince Arthur Galleries have watercolours by Walter Coucell till Dec. 7.

Crafts are appearing increasingly as Christmas nears. The Merton Gallery opened Tuesday with a large exhibition of Dolls — ranging from ceramic to paper, minute to enormous. For show and sale. The Pottery Shop's Contemporary Ontario Glass exhibition receives unbroken attention till Nov. 30. (today).

Very worthwhile is an exhibition of Ontario's Pre-Columbian Renaissance — young woodland Indian painters. Till Jan. 29. Pre-Columbian Art from Mexico will be showing at the Albert White Gallery starting Saturday.

rock

Alreet. My Review editor is so dumb, he thinks that Eggs Benedict is a Mafia hit man. He thinks that Veronica Lake is a body of water.

Okay, enough of this gay banter. The Colonial has Dianne Heatherington this week. Gasworks has Pockets, the Jarvis House has Lady Larry's has the Karrol Bros, the El Mocambo has Sherbert (Australia's answer to the Bay City Rollers, the Tube has Harbinger and the Cuckoo has Boone Creek. Toronto rock retards Wireless will be at Dr. John's this week. The Imps have been held over at the Yonge Station.

On the concert things scene, things are looking dull. Elliot Murphy, not Eric Carmen, will be opening for Billy Joel. Rush will be having a second show (oh goody) on Dec. 30th. Cano will be at Con. Hall this Sunday and Murray McLachlan will be there on Dec. 20th. Aerosmith will be at the Gardens on the tenth of Dec.

On the folkie side, Dave Essig is at the Riverboat and Don Rosals at the Fingerboard Cafe. Colin Linden and the Lucky Charms are at the Horseshoe.

Aside from that, the local music scene is about as exciting as watching a traffic light. Hang on for the Diodes concert at the Shock Theatre on Dec. 16th.

jazz

Hello Jazz Fans! Most of you have undoubtedly noticed that the jazz situation in Toronto is in a slump. Clubs have closed down right, left and center, and even talented artists are having a harder time paying their bills. One critic thinks that the problem is a local, seasonal one, and that come summer we'll be revitalized. Others, such as pianist Frank Falco, are disturbed that the slump is nationwide and may be here for a while. To combat this danger, all loyal fans should have at least three drinks and a filet mignon each time they frequent one of our down-trodden jazz establishments.

Catch the Kathy Moses Quartet at Hart House today, 12-2 pm.

A quick rundown of the clubs: The big band sound of Rob McConnell's Boss Brass continues to boom at Basin Street until Dec. 3. (Thanks to Joe Stott for finding the typo in last week's column.)

Trumpeter Blue Mitchell blasts away the week at Bourbon St., followed on Monday by the trombone sound of Slide Hampton.

At George's, Bernie Senensky entertains the diners until Saturday, making way on the 5th for the Moe Koffman Quintet.

The Cack Wayne Trio (guitar) do what they do best at DJ's this week. Next week brings in Arnett Cobb on tenor.

Lots happening at Cafe Soho this week: Tim Cummins plays guitar tomorrow after hours, making way on Friday and Saturday after hours for the superb talent of saxophonist Jane Fair & Co. To round out the festivities, "Wizard of the Keyboard" Ira Cohen will tinkle away from 2-4 pm on Sunday.

Once again the Phoenix Theatre is reviving The Norman Conquests, starting December 6th; advance warning for the Ayckbourne buff, call 922-7835 for details. The Royal Alex continues with Maugham's mannered The Circle, call 363-4211 and bring oxygen if you have balloon seats. Ryerson Theatre department is presenting Shakespeare's Twelfth Night, with previews this Saturday at 2:30 and 8:30 p.m. The Sea is underway at T.A.P., call 366-7723 for details of pricing on the shows, each night except Sunday, at 8:00, with a Saturday matinee at 2 p.m. Toronto Free Theatre has held over Zastrozzi one more week, performances Tuesday-Sunday at 8:00 p.m., Sunday matinee at 2 p.m.; call 368-2856 for details. And Toronto Stuck Theatre restores its finances with The Owl and the Pussycat at the Colonnade and The Mousetrap on Belmont Street. Call 922-0084; shows Wednesday to Sunday at 8:30, but Saturday at 7 and 9:30.

A few words more on openings: on campus, at the MacMillan Theatre, Albert Herring next Tuesday and Wednesday, 8:00 p.m., call 978-3744; and at U.C. Playhouse, The Boor by Chekhov today and Friday at noon, 79a St. George St. At Innis, the Vic Dramatic Club presents Cabaret, every evening this week at 9 o'clock. Tickets $3, pub opens at 8 p.m.

Other new plays include Toronto Workshop's The Club, commencing tonight at 8:30 and running for several weeks. Call 925-8640; the Thursday formal opening is at 8:00 sharp. Also hitting the boards this week is Rudy Wiebe's Far as the Eye Can See, a collaborative effort based on an actual incident in Alberta's coal crisis. At the Tarragon, Tuesday through Sunday at 8 p.m., Sunday matinee at 2:30. Call 531-1827 for prices and reservations.

Green Paper Calls For Changes

By HUGH STUART

Recently the federal government published a Green Paper entitled "Towards a National Policy on Amateur Sport". Although the report makes dull reading, (it ranks up there with Soc. 220), once the double-talk is deciphered, there are some points pertaining to Canadian Universities that are worthy of mention.

First, it is necessary to give a general outline of the Green Paper. The driving force behind the Paper is the belief of the Minister of State, Fitness and Amateur Sport, Iona Campagnolo, that "Canadians can achieve even higher levels of participation and fitness, and . . . that excellence in sport, previously beyond our grasp is now possible."

Where do the universities fit into Campagnolo's visions of glory? It appears that the quality of university programs and athletes will increase. This would be due to increased government subsidization of amateur athletes, enabling them to afford university. While at university, the athlete would benefit from high quality training because, "We (the government) propose that the universities be given assistance to subsidize the salaries of coaches contributing significantly to national teams."

Naturally there are strings attached and unfortunately it looks as if the university students will be paying the bill. Keeping in mind that these are only proposals and not policies: "In return for this financial assistance, we would ask that the universities commit themselves to excellence in their sports programs, co-ordinating them with those of the community and expanding training and competitive opportunities . . ."

If co-ordinating programs with the community means sharing U of T's facilities with others, a number of problems could emerge, because of the limited facilities of a large university. Hopefully the government can come up with a program that can overcome such problems and allow the development of a sports program that will be to the benefit of everyone.

Blues Perform Well In Pool

By GLYNIS PETERS

This Saturday the swim team were given a chance to scan the opposition at the McMaster Invationals. A limit of two people per event kept U of T's rather large team to a minimum of entries. This factor, coupled with the non-pressure situation, enabled many of the swimmers to branch out and swim other than their regular events without any penalty.

A strong performance was turned in by all competitors with victories going to Elaine Keith in the 400 and 800 freestyle; Anne Marie Latta in the 400 Individual Medley and 200 Butterfly and Jane Wright in 200 Breaststroke.

Excellent performances were also turned in by Linda Lozowsky, Liane Hubbard and rookie, Marilyn Preston. Another rookie, Jennifer Mutchan, placed 12th out of 26 competitors in her first year of diving. This commendable performance is a definite indication of future promise and important for what has in the past been a weak U of T diving team.

Of the 18 girls on the team, there is a chance for 8 of them to attend a Christmas training camp in the Virgin Islands. Criteria for selection to this group of 8 is qualification for the Nationals.

Although final team standings were not tallied, McMaster came out as the unofficial overall winners. They are fielding a very strong team this year, as are Western, who were not extremely impressive at this meet but will undoubtedly be strong contenders later on in the season.

All teams seemed to have added some excellent swimmers to their rosters and U of T will have to swim strongly to come out on top this year.

Hockey

By GLYNIS PETERS

In an exciting contest last Friday night, the U of T women's Ice Hockey team dominated a good Queen's squad and came up with a 4-1 victory.

In first period action, Linda

Harley popped in two quick goals within the space of minute, on assists by Val Bush and Maureen Mitchell.

Five minutes later, Queen's came back to make the score 2-1, going into the second period. At one point during the second period, Toronto had two players serving penalties, leaving three Lady Blues holding off the opposition for just over 1½ minutes.

Even with this two man advantage, however, Queen's failed to score.

Toronto rounded out the third period with two more goals. Betty Cook, assisted by Cathy Brown and Noreen Lem was responsible for one, and Noreen Lem netted one herself with the help of Jay Westlake.

In the nets, Mary Gailand turned in an excellent performance as she limited Queen's to only one goal.

An Evening Of Dance

An Evening Dance Program is being presented by dancers from the U of T as well as outside community groups at the Benson Building on Friday, December 2 at 7:30 p.m. The program which will take place in the dance studios, will feature facets of contemporary, jazz, folk and tap dancing.

The Contemporary Dance Performance Group, under the direction of Iris Hamilton will kick off the evening. Other performers will include The Folk Dance Performance Group directed by Judy Silver, a second Contemporary dance group under Vera Davis and a Jazz Performance Group directed by Loyd Malenfant.

The community will be represented by La Compagnie Des Pies Gauches.

The program will also include dance choreographed to the music of stars such as Joan Baez, Marvin Hamlisch and Beethoven. The final dance of the evening will be a folk dance in which spectators will be invited to join in.

Fouls Plague Blues

By JEANNE GRAY

Last Friday night the Lady Blues, hot off a decisive thrashing of York, took to the court ready to tackle Queen's. Unfortunately, early foul trouble and a high percentage of successful free throws by Queen's contributed to an early lead by the Gaels. Great hustling and formidable drive were exhibited by Karen Pim, a real leader on the court and Barb Grochowski was again the high scorer on the team.

Joanne Goodrow displayed considerable poise on defense, leading the team for the first half of the game. A final score of 53-43 for Queen's must be examined in light of the fact that 19 of those points did come from the free throw line.

U of T has a chance to come back this week when they take on Carleton, Thursday at 7:30 and Ottawa at 12:30 on Saturday. The season is only just beginning and the team is pulling closer together with each game that they put behind them. Good Luck in this week's games!

Synchro Second

This past weekend, U of T hosted the first sectional synchro swim competition of the season. The teams displayed fine performances despite the fact that the underwater speakers intermittently conked out, tape recordings broke during performances and the jitters of the first performance were felt by all.

The four areas of competition were: figures (novice and senior), solos, duets and team. Toronto scored a third place in solo competition behind Queen's and McGill. In duets, Edite Marouskis and Janis Gourley paired together to place third, again behind Queen's and McGill. The 8-man team really showed its style, showing true synchronization and form, and placing 2nd behind Queen's. Queen's won the competition in overall points with Toronto coming second.

The results of this competition give the team a hopeful outlook towards their performance in the finals in February. During the next two months, the swimmers will be working on improving the choreography of their present routines as well as adding a second duet to fill all the competitive entries.

Ken Wood Fencing Maitre

Fencing Victory

By SUE LANGLEY

Continuing the trend set at the season's opening tournament, the Varsity women's fencing team won the first sectional of the OWIAA competition held Saturday at the Benson Building. The team, consisting of Alice Chan, Lily Dobay, Debbie Frankish and Sue Langley, defeated McMaster 16-0 and Brock 14-2.

Many thanks are owed to Maitre Ken Wood for his training, inspiration and organization of the tournament. The second sectional will be held February 11, sending the top two teams to the OWIAA finals that take place this year at McMaster.

Blues Breeze By Laurentian

By JIMO O'LEARY

The U of T hockey Blues are threatening to run away with the Eastern Division of the OUAA after an impressive showing on the weekend. The Blues remained unbeaten after six games, routing the Laurentian Voyageurs twice in games played in Sudbury on the weekend.

Varsity center Frank Davis.

The Blues' victories, coupled with a York loss to Queen's, pushed Toronto into an eight-point lead in their division. Toronto meets York tonight and Queen's twice on the weekend and could all but wrap up first place with victories.

The long bus ride to Sudbury seemed to agree with the players as they put on an impressive offensive performance, drubbing the Voyageurs 11-5 on Saturday and 13-3 on Sunday. As has been the case all season, the Blues produced a balanced attack with scoring coming from all their lines. Thirteen different players had at least one goal.

When coach Tom Watt claimed at the beginning of the season that he would like to improve the offensive performance of this year's team he obviously was not kidding. To date they have scored 60 goals in their six league games while giving up only 18.

In Saturday's 11-5 victory, the Blues jumped into a 5-1 first period lead which was upped to 10-3 after two frames. Doug Caines and Dan Tsabouchi led the scoring parade with two goals each while Joe Grant, Frank Davis, Alex Jeans, Cary Farelli, Dan D'Alvise, Greg St. James and Larry Hopkins potted singles.

On Sunday, the Blues picked up where they left off the day before, firing 50 shots at the Voyageur net. Dan Tsabouchi had his second two goal game of the weekend, while St. James and Jeans also picked up two goals. Hopkins, Doug Herridge, Brad Tamblin, D'Alvise, Farelli, Ron Harris and Rob Gemmel rounded out the scoring.

In other weekend action, Queen's upset York 5-1. The game was never in doubt as the Golden Gaels jumped into an early 4-0 lead. For York it was the second setback in a row and drops their record to one win and two losses.

Western strengthened their hold on first place in the Western Conference with a convincing 9-4 victory over Ottawa. Western used three power play goals in the first period to pace them to the win.

Western Falls To Late Rally

By CRAIG WARDLAW

The Varsity Blues basketball squad showed excellent spirit in a come-from-behind victory over Western Friday night at the Benson building. It was only an exhibition contest but both teams gave it their best before a good crowd who appreciated the prowess of both teams. It took the Blues a while to get rolling but when they did, there was no stopping them as they outpointed Western, 75-69.

The Blues came out flat and Western took advantage jumping to an early 30-12 lead. Blues coach, John McManus did some fast player substitutions but the Blues didn't come alive until an ankle injury sidelined Western's starting centre, Bruce Meikle. The Blues' Joe Tucci was inserted into the game and Toronto came to life. Tucci only managed two points himself but his lively play and good setups allowed the Blues to fight back to within three points at the half. The second half was all Blues as they put 40 points on the board and allowed Western only 31.

Toronto was led by veteran guard Doug Fox who posted 16 points and was top scorer in the game. A good performance was also put in by forward John Zanette who scored 13 points.

For Western, the big guns were Scott McLeod and Francis Moccio who gained 13 and 12 points respectively. Although McManus used his whole bench to give experience to his young team, most of the scoring came from the starting five of Fox, Tim McGhie, Zanette, Joe Braunstein and Randy Cook. These five together scored 55 points, the remaining scoring being distributed fairly evenly among the rest of the team.

Before the game coach McManus sounded hopeful of his team's chances and was rewarded with the victory. However, he stressed that this year's league is strong with York and Laurentian expected to be the top teams. The Blues, except for their two senior guards, Fox and McGhie, are an extremely young team with mostly sophomores and a couple of rookies. McManus has high hopes for centre, Randy Cook but if this game is any indication every member of the team has good potential for the future.

The next Varsity home game is with Ottawa, Saturday Dec. 3 at 2:30 but the game to watch for is the one coming up against Simon Fraser. An exciting schedule like this should be seen by every Basketball fan so get out and watch some high stepping action.

York Misses Big Scorers

By JIMO O'LEARY

The York Yeomen are in trouble. Although the 1977-78 hockey season is still very young the Yeomen are in the position that they have to beat the U of T in their encounter tonight if they want to stay in contention for the division title.

The Yeomen have gotten off to a poor start, winning only one of their first three games, to leave them tied with Ottawa in last place. Toronto on the other hand has looked great, winning six in a row and blowing the opposition out of the rink on a number of occasions.

The Yeomen romped to first place last year on the strength of their offence. This year four of their top five scorers did not return, including the outstanding pair of Ron Hawkshaw and Bob Wasson.

The absence of the scorers has been evident as the Yeomen have been held to only eight goals while allowing 15. Toronto, on the other hand, has been scoring at a torrid pace with all of their lines contributing.

In their only encounter in regular season play so far this season, the Blues beat the Yeomen 7-3. The win, however, was not as easy as the score may indicate. The Blues were forced to fight back from a 2-0 deficit in an exciting, hard-fought game.

A Yeoman loss tonight would leave them an almost insurmountable 12 points behind Toronto. For this reason it can be expected that York will be flying when they hit the ice tonight. The Yeomen are a better team than they have shown so far this season and usually save their best hockey for Toronto. Everything points to an exciting game, so why not head down to Varsity Arena at 8:00 p.m. and take in the action.

Interfac Report

By ANDRIS AUZINS

Things tightened up in interfac hockey, at least in division one play. Vic lost once and Erindale won two to catch up to the quick start that had Vic looking like a runaway for first place. Now the top five teams in first division are bunched in the top two places. Vic and Erindale share first while Scarborough, Phys Ed and St. Mike's occupy second place.

The Engineers with one victory are mired in the inextricable depths of last place, having lost five other games (tiddly-winks, checkers, ring-toss, shuffleboard, and pebble-skipping). It should be interesting to watch how the standings develop come the second half of the season in January.

Hockey Standings

Division One "A"

Victoria	4	1	0
Erindale	4	1	0
Scarborough	2	3	0

Division One "B"

Dentistry	4	0	2
Trinity	3	1	2
Medicine	1	1	2
New	1	3	0
University	0	3	2

The Volleyball Schedule seems to have suffered from an attack of the double-D's or if you prefer, double defaults. Both Scarborough and Medicine have D-Ded while the Engineers have symptoms in the presence of a single default. First place changed hands, unaffected by the new developments, as New overlook Engineering on the strength of their undefeated record and the Engineers' one loss.

Volleyball Standings

Division One

	W	L
New	6	0
Engineering	6	1
Erindale	3	4
SGS	3	5
Scarborough	2	5
Medicine	1	6

First Division Basketball is very tight in the first three positions as Engineering, Dentistry and St. Mike's fight it out for the top spot. Engineering leads the pack at this time as it had the fortune of coming out on top in some really close decisions. They had the benefit of 75-74 and 67-66 wins over contender St. Mike's and Tail-ender Meds.

Tied for second is the team which has the distinction of registering the highest score in this year's action and coming closest to the magical hundred point mark. Dentistry scored a 97-66 outcome over Fac Ed.

Ryerson Open Tests Wrestlers

By ANDREW MAHON

Wrestlers from Iowa, Quebec and Saskatchewan were on hand to take part in an international tournament held at Ryerson last Saturday.

A group of 11 U of T wrestlers attended the day long tournament to meet with some of the toughest competition from North American colleges. The tournament is considered "extremely prestigious" according to U of T wrestling coach, Joe Rabel, and the results are utilized by the Canadian Amateur Wrestling Association (CAWA) to determine standings.

There were twelve weight classes, with about 16 grapplers in each class.

The best performance by a U of T competitor was by Clive Llewelyn who placed first out of 17 people in his weight class (167 lbs.). Llewelyn, who is also U of T's assistant coach, had 4 pins and decided three others en route to his impressive finish.

Teammate Bill Hogarth placed third in the same weight class. Hogarth lost a closely contested 3-6 decision to Llewelyn.

In the 142 lb. weight class, Rob Moore placed fourth out of 15. Moore pinned three, and was grappling with Olympian Doug Yeats when he was forced to withdraw with a back injury.

Sam Turchiaro, in a field of 16, had one pin, won two decisions but also lost two decisions. According to coach Rabel, "his performance was good but he had some tough people in his weight class."

Alan Tamane, at 126 lbs. won one by a decision, was pinned once and was decided once.

The remaining four U of T grapplers had two fights each. Al Kosugi (126 lbs.), Terry Murray (150), Jerry Ranking (167) and Keith Barrie at 177 lbs. Murray, Barrie and Ranking lost their two bouts by pins.

The tournament which ran from noon to about 10 p.m., featured 155 competitors and there were usually 4 or 5 bouts occurring simultaneously. After the tournament Rabel pointed out that "these tournaments are a little tiring for the fans, but we will be having some team to team competition in the future."

Rob Moore sets himself for the next onslaught.

Blues Win One, Lose One

The U of T volleyball team experienced both the "thrill of victory and the agony of defeat," in games over the weekend. Against a weak Ryerson team, the Blues cruised to victory in three straight games. York proved a tougher opponent and Toronto dropped a narrow decision after five games.

Toronto plays in a hotly contested division which makes it likely that they will have many more close games before the season is over. Whether or not Toronto makes the playoffs will depend on how they handle themselves in the close ones.

According to coach Tiit Romet, "it is tough on players to lose the close ones". It is harder to play in a close game however. The players sometimes try too hard which leads them to make little mistakes, according to Romet.

To date, the Blues have been coming out on the short end in the tight games. Romet is not too concerned however and expects things will change as the season progresses. "It's just a matter of getting more experience," says Romet. He is confident things will come around with time and that "I have no doubt we are as good as the other teams." The rest of the season will attest to the validity of this judgement.

Skating Anyone?

By ANDRIS AUZINS

Interfac Sport usually encompasses some form of competition and never really comes to us in a pure form of simple recreation. Now the Intramural office has proposed a natural ice-rink on the back-campus, for the enjoyment of all students. Having outdoor rinks at the U of T has been a tradition but over the years has disappeared from the winter campus scene.

Sandy Henderson, Assistant Coordinator in the Intramural Office, is spearheading an effort to have this forgotten tradition revived. Talks are underway with the Physical Plant for supply of equipment necessary but student support and help is also needed.

The tentative ready date for the ice is early next term and student volunteers are needed for maintenance and construction of the ice surface. As well, some input as to rules and uses for the rink is required.

There are lights on the back campus and that means that skating can be during students off-hours and become part of the activities of the downtown campus. Student help is needed though so that this worthwhile restoration of a U of T tradition gets off the ground and can be enjoyed by all.

Residence and house participation might be a natural way to help get an ice-rink on the fields beside Hart House. Anyone interested in this project should get in touch with the Intramural Office, Room 106 of Hart House.
